Mr. Chairman, it is not true that there is no demand for the repeal of the internal-revenue law; it is not true that customs duties raise the price of the articles on which they are levied; it is not true that the system of collecting revenue by levying customs duties and our present tariff laws are "the vicious, inequitable, and illogical source of unnecessary taxation;" it is not true that the farmer suffers because of our tariff laws.

This system of collecting revenue was recommended by Washington in his first message, and the first law ever passed by the Congress of the United States was one which declared in the statute the necessity of protection for American manufactures. All the great fathers of the Republic favored a system which would build up our home manufactures.

Washington, in his first annual message, January 8, 1790, said:

> A free people ought not only to be armed but disciplined, to which end a uniform and well-digested plan is requisite; and their safety and interest require that they should promote such manufactories as tend to render them independent on others for essential, particularly military, supplies.

Jefferson, in his second annual message, December 15, 1802, says:

> To cultivate peace and maintain commerce and navigation in all their lawful enterprises, to foster our fisheries and nurseries of navigation, and for the nurture of man, and protect the manufactures adapted to our circumstances.

And in a letter to Benjamin Austin, of Boston, Mass., 1816, he uses these words:

> The general inquiry now is, shall we make our own comforts or go without them at the will of a foreign nation? He therefore who is now against domestic manufactures must be for reducing us either to a dependence upon that nation or to be clothed in skins and live like beasts in dens and caves. I am proud to say I am not one of these. Experience has taught me that manufactures are now as necessary to our independence as to our comfort.

Madison, in his special message, May 23, 1809, uses this language:

> The revision of our public commercial laws proper to adapt them to the arrangement which has taken place with Great Britain, will doubtless engage the early attention of Congress. It will be worthy at the same time of their just and provident care to make such further alterations in the laws as will more especially protect and foster the several branches of manufacture which have been recently instituted or extended by the laudable exertions of our citizens.

And in his first annual message, November 29, 1809, in speaking of the condition of the country, he says:

> In a cultivation of the materials, and the extention of the useful manufactures, more especially in the general application to household fabrics, we behold a rapid diminution of our dependence on foreign supplies.
> But there is no subject that can enter with greater force and merit into the deliberations of Congress than a consideration of the means to preserve and promote the manufactures which have sprung into existence and attained an unparalleled maturity throughout the United States during the period of the European wars. This source of national independence and wealth I anxiously recommend, therefore, to the prompt and constant guardianship of Congress.

Monroe was just as decided in his utterances. In his inaugural, March 5, 1817, he says:

> Our manufactures will likewise require the systematic and fostering care of the Government. Possessing, as we do, all the raw materials, the fruit of our own soil and industry, we ought not to depend in the degree we have done on supplies from other countries.
> Equally important is it to provide at home a market for our own materials, as by extending the competition it will enhance the price and protect the cultivator against the casualties incident to foreign markets.

And in his first annual message, December 2, 1817, he reiterates these views:

> Our manufactures will require the continued attention of Congress. The capital employed in them is considerable, and the knowledge required in the machinery and fabric of all the most useful manufactures is of great value. Their preservation, which depends on due encouragement, is connected with the high interests of the nation. Under this impression I recommend a review of the tariff for the purpose of affording such additional protection to those articles which we are prepared to manufacture, or which are more immediately connected with the defense and independence of the country.

J. Q. Adams says:

> As yet no symptoms of diminution are perceptible in the receipts of the Treasury. As yet little addition of cost has even been experienced upon the articles burdened with heavier duties by the last tariff. The domestic manufacturer supplies the same or a kindred article at a diminished price, and the consumer pays the same tribute to the labor of his own countryman which he must have otherwise paid to foreign industry and toil.

In the second annual message of Andrew Jackson, December 7, 1830, occur the following words:

> The power to impose duties on imports originally belonged to the several States. The right to adjust those duties with a view to the encouragement of domestic branches of industry is so completely identical with that power that it is difficult to suppose the existence of the one without the other. The States have delegated their whole authority over imports to the General Government, without limitation or restriction, saving the very inconsiderable reservation relating to their inspection laws.

In fact, he had before this given quite plain expression to his views. In a letter to Col. Robert Patterson, of Philadelphia, dated May 17, 1823, in acknowledging the present of a hat for Mrs. Jackson, made of American materials by American hands, he says:

> Its workmanship, reflecting the highest credit upon the authors, will be regarded as an evidence of the perfection which our domestic manufactures may hereafter acquire if properly fostered and protected. Upon the success of our manufactures, as the handmaid of agriculture and commerce, depends in a great measure the independence of our own country, and I assure you that none can feel more sensibly than I do the necessity of encouraging them.

In a letter to Dr. L. H. Coleman, of my own State (North Carolina), August 26, 1824, he says:

> Heaven smiled upon us and gave us liberty and independence. The same Providence has blessed us with the means of national independence and national defense. If we omit or refuse to use the gifts which He has extended to us we deserve not the continuance of His blessings. He has filled our mountains and our plains with minerals, with lead, iron, and copper, and given us a climate and soil for the growing of hemp and wool. These being the great materials of our national defense, they ought to have extended to them adequate and fair protection, that our manufacturers and laborers may be placed in a fair competition with those of Europe, and that we may have within our country a supply of these leading and important articles so essential to war.
> In short, sir, we have been too long subject to British merchants. It is time we should become a little Americanized, and instead of feeding the paupers and laborers of England feed our own, or else in a short time, by continuing our present policy, we shall be paupers ourselves.

And yet President Cleveland and his party, professing to believe in the doctrines and follow in the footsteps of Andrew Jackson, want to turn us over again to the tender mercies of "British merchants."

The fact that John Quincy Adams stated in 1825 that the price of goods is not increased by the duty levied on the foreign article, a fact that is known to every man in the country who will take the trouble to read a price current of 1859 and one of this year, does not seem to have penetrated to the White House. The President asserts that the farmer pays more for what he buys because of the levying of customs duties, when in fact the farmer pays less for what he has to buy and receives more for what he has to sell.

Mr. Chairman, it is because I represent a district in this House which has been almost purely agricultural in the past, but which is now in part becoming a manufacturing district, that I am compelled to rise here and enter my protest against such doctrines as are contained in the message from which I have quoted and which it is proposed to put into practical operation by the bill under consideration. It is a fact that has been demonstrated so plainly that, he who runs may read, and even a fool can understand, that in those States where the vocations are diversified, where manufactories are erected, where artisans are employed with their skilled labor in producing from the raw materials that come from the field or farm, from woodland or from the mine, such goods as are required for the use of civilized man that there the price of farm lands is increased, not tenfold, nor one hundred fold, but several hundred fold over the price of the same but better lands where only agriculture exists. While the price of the land is thus improved its products are diversified and a ready sale found for them.

It may seem a strange assertion, Mr. Chairman, I have just made, that the products of the land are diversified by the introduction of manufacturing establishments, but it is nevertheless true. Unless home markets are established the farmer can only find sale for those articles which will bear transportation to a distant or foreign market, but if you have a place near at hand where everything can be sold that the soil can produce, he can raise all kinds of vegetables, fruits, milk, butter, eggs, and those smaller products of the farm that will not bear transportation, and I therefore say that the products of the farm are diversified by the introduction of manufacturing establishments.

That it is true what I assert as regards the value of land in manufacturing States, the following table is the best evidence:

Here are three Southern farming States in a group, and three Northern manufacturing States:

	Value of farming lands.
Farming States:
North Carolina	$6.07
South Carolina	5.10
Georgia	4.30
Total	15.47
Average	5.15
Manufacturing States:
New York	$44.41
New Jersey	65.16
Pennsylvania	49.30
Average	52.95

Observe the difference. The farmers, land is worth more than ten times as much in the manufacturing States as it is in the agricultural States.

Wages paid for transient farm-labor per day two years ago was, in—

New York	$1.26
Average	1.21
And in—

Less than one-half as much.

In North and South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Arkansas 77 per cent. of the people are engaged in agriculture. These six States possess the best climate, the finest land, and grow the most valuable products of the country. The farming lands have an average value of $5.18 per acre; the rugged lands of Pennsylvania, with only 21 per cent. of the population engaged in agriculture, are worth $49.30 per acre.

In thirteen counties of that State (Pennsylvania) are to be found the principal manufacturing establishments, and the farming land in these counties is worth $86.73, whilst in the remainder it is worth only $40.02. In Ohio the most of the manufacturing of iron is in twelve counties, and the land in these counties is worth $67.85, whilst in the remainder it is only worth $42.46.

But it is true not only of counties in the same States but of neighborhoods in the same counties, that the building of manufactories increases the prices of land near that factory, and gives to the farmers who own that land better prices, and a quicker market for all they produce. The district I have the honor to represent in this House contains eight counties, and I herewith present a table of these counties, showing the aggregate land, the average value of land per acre, the value of money invested in manufactories, the real and personal property, the population, and the wealth per capita.

Statistics of counties of the Fourth Congressional district, North Carolina.

Name of county.	Area in acres.	Aggregate land values.	Average value per acre.	Stock in incorporated companies.	Total value real and personal property.	Population.	Wealth per capita.
Chatham	487,470	2,084,924	4.27+	9,630	3,218,206	23,453	138.34+
Durham	154,524	937,811	6.07+	110,940	4,013,049	.....	.....
Franklin	271,333	1,598,773	5.89+	8,560	2,543,502	20,829	122.11+
Johnston	480,504	2,432,891	5.06+	14,090	3,978,684	23,461	169.12+
Nash	332,816	1,669,026	5.01+	825	2,629,925	17,731	148.25+
Orange	234,561	1,030,775	4.82+	30,098	1,995,057	23,698	84.18+
Wake	523,473	3,302,520	6.49+	1,119,963	10,609,189	47,930	121.34+

It will be seen by looking at this table that Alamance County, which has much the largest amount of money invested in manufactories, has $219 wealth for each person in the county, that its land has an average value of $7.23 per acre, whilst Chatham County, immediately adjoining Alamance, only has $138 per capita, and its land is only worth $4.27 per acre, and it has almost no manufactories. Durham County is a new county made from Orange and Wake. Numbers of manufactories have been established in this county, and though its lands are no better than those of the counties from which it was taken, they are worth $6.07 average per acre; that is, a few manufactories built in Durham County have increased the value of its lands in five years $1.80 per acre on the average.

Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen on the other side of the House, following the lead of President Cleveland, declare that they are in favor of the repeal of war taxes. So am I. And strange to say, I am willing to let the Democratic party declare what war taxes are. The only difficulty in agreeing to this proposition is to decide which is the Democratic party. Its convention, which met in 1884 at Chicago, composed of delegates from every district in the United States, from every State and from every Territory, declared that the internal-revenue taxes are "an odious war tax," and should be repealed. President Cleveland, whom this convention nominated and whom a chapter of accidents and a hook full of frauds placed in the Presidential chair, in his message to this Congress said that the internal-revenue taxes were the best taxes to retain, and that the system—the great system of protection to American industry—was an odious war tax.

Mr. Chairman, which is the original Jacobs? Is it that large body of men assembled at Chicago representing the Democrats of the country, or is it that large man seated at the other end of the avenue? Does he compose the Democratic party? Because if he does, I am not willing that the party shall determine what are war taxes and what are not; but if the representatives of the Democratic people assembled in their convention constituted the Democratic party, then I am willing that it should decide this question for me as to what war taxes are.

I assume, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Cleveland is not the Democratic party. It is true beyond a question that he has the Democratic party by the throat and is compelling it to do what he pleases. I notice gentlemen on this floor who are Democrats and have been all their lives, who come here as the representatives of Democratic constituencies, that squirm and wriggle in the tight grasp of this political despot, but they can not escape; they bend to his will because he has possession of the flesh-pots, which have always been attractive since the days when Moses led the Israelites from the land of Egypt and out of the house of bondage. Holding the flesh-pots as he does, ladling out the pork, Mr. Cleveland is the Democratic party. The others rush to the feed-trough at his call and obey his commands. Taking him as the Democratic party, I will not permit that he select what are and what are not war taxes that should be removed.

Sir, since the foundation of this Government there has been one set of taxes recognized as a direct war tax. The Democratic party in its convention was right when it said the internal-revenue taxes are a war tax. I want that tax repealed. It has taken from the people $3,569,174,618. From my own State there has been taken $38,000,000 in the last twenty years. Poor, impoverished Carolina has been compelled to pay at the rate of 2 per cent. per annum on the valuation of its property. It has paid in twenty years nearly $40 for every living soul within its borders. It has paid a tax of $30 on every acre of land in the State planted in tobacco. It has paid over 4 per cent. of the value of all its farm products each year into the United States Treasury. The reconstructed States have paid into the Treasury of the United States in twenty years over $300,000,000 as internal-revenue taxes. The value of the farms in these States only equals the value of the farms in the single State of Ohio, and yet, poor as they were, these farms have been compelled to pay twice as much of internal-revenue taxes as the State of Ohio has paid.

I could load down the RECORD, Mr. Chairman, with tables to show the injustice of this tax upon the farmers of the country, but it is unnecessary; enough of that has been done. I only desire to say, sir, that, so far as my State is concerned, the demand for the repeal of the internal-revenue tax is universal. It comes from every one, of all politics, without regard to race, color, or previous condition of servitude. There is not a voter in the State of North Carolina that does not demand this repeal. There is not a man, be he Democrat or Republican, who dare advocate the retention of this tax before any audience in North Carolina; and this, Mr. Chairman, is the highest proof possible of the statement I heretofore made that President Cleveland has the Democratic party by the throat. He wants to retain the internal-revenue tax; North Carolina Democrats want it repealed; and yet these same North Carolina Democrats propose to advocate the renomination of President Cleveland, and when that is done they will throw up their hats and shout for him as though they wanted him elected.

Some of them will even go so far as to vote for him, but the number will be ridiculously small in comparison with the number of Democrats in the State, and those that do shout and vote for him will do it with a mental reservation. They will be in the condition of a Western man who made a bet that he could eat crow. When the dish was prepared he sat down to it and commenced his task. He swallowed a few mouthfuls, and said, "Yes, I kin eat crow, but I'm blamed if I hanker arter it."

My Democratic colleague from the Second district of the State admits this when he said here but a day ago—

It is well understood that the people of North Carolina, whom I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, are intensely opposed to the present internal-revenue system, and that their plan of revenue reduction is to begin with the repeal of that system.

My colleague correctly states the wishes of the people who sent him and me here to represent them in part. Knowing their desires, knowing their will, my colleague announces that he does not intend to respect their desires or obey the will of his constituents. He deliberately misrepresents the people of his State and section at the bidding of the Democratic dictator at the other end of the Avenue.

Mr. COWLES, another colleague, from the Eighth district, in his speech on Monday last, says:

Sir, we have too much revenue and too many systems of revenue. Strike down that which is effete and has been permitted to remain beyond the period of its allotted time, and give vital force and energy to that which since the organization of this Government has been established and maintained as the true source of Federal revenue.

The natural conclusion to be drawn from this declaration is that the speaker regards the repeal of the internal-revenue law as of paramount importance to the revision of the tariff.

The votes of my colleagues on the Mills bill will be watched with no little interest by the people of North Carolina.

I beg to quote from the proceedings of a Democratic convention held in Rockingham County, North Carolina, only a few days since. This is one of the strongest Democratic counties in the State. Among the resolutions adopted was the following:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Democracy of Rockingham, in convention assembled, that our Representatives in Congress should vote for the immediate and unconditional repeal of the internal-revenue laws, and that if they find it impossible at this session to abolish the internal revenue and revise the tariff, we prefer the former should be done.

But to pass on to other subjects. I desire to say a few words upon the action of this Administration and of this House upon the subject of finances, and I shall confine myself to two propositions; that is, the contraction of the currency, and the payment of a premium on bonds. During the last campaign Democratic speakers and Democratic papers were proclaiming from the hill-tops that the Republican party had accumulated $400,000,000 in the Treasury and were holding it there to the great damage of the country. They said that when the Democrats came into power this money should be distributed among the people of the country; it should no longer be hoarded in the Treasury of the Untied States. Mr. Daniel Manning, who succeeded a Republican as Secretary of the Treasury, found in the Treasury $375,000,000. In the three years which the Administration has been in power the amount in the Treasury has nearly been doubled, and there is hoarded to-day nearly $700,000,000. This is the difference between Democratic pledges and Democratic performances.

Instead of reducing the surplus the Administration has nearly doubled it. It is true the Administration had an object in doing this; its object has been to be able to say that it was necessary to reduce taxation, and in that way attack the American system of protection for the benefit of its friends in foreign lands; and why not, when we find that Thomas F. Bayard, the Secretary of State; Charles S. Fairchild, the Secretary of the Treasury; and William W. Endicott, the Secretary of War, are all members of the Cobden Free Trade Club of London, and that, in unison with them, the Speaker of this House, elected by Democratic votes to preside over it (though he failed of being elected a member of the body) is also a member of this free-trade Cobden Club.

The free-traders, controlling the executive as well as the legislative departments, were determined to hold all the money possible in the Treasury, that they might have an excuse to declare it was necessary to reduce what they choose to call taxation—that is, the duties on imported goods. In March, 1881, when a Republican President was inaugurated and a Republican Secretary took charge of the Treasury Department, both this President and this Secretary, coming from the great Northwest, not being the tools of the Wall-street speculators, as is the condition now, it was evident that there would accumulate a great surplus in the Treasury and that the price of bonds would appreciate very rapidly. That Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Windom, immediately and without hesitation acted upon the law then and now on the statute-books—the law of 1869, which authorized him to refund the debt at a lower rate of interest. And he did refund the debt, reducing yearly interest several million dollars by so doing, and at the same time preventing a gorge of money in the Treasury.

Mr. Cleveland and his Secretaries lacked either the inclination or the capacity, perhaps both, to act as did President Garfield and Secretary Windom; the result has been the accumulation of money of which I have already spoken, and the appreciation of bonds until they now bear from 25 to 30 per cent. premium.

In the whole history of the world, from the earliest days of civilization down to the present time, no nation has ever paid a premium upon its own indebtedness. Every nation reserves the sovereign right to pay its debts when it pleases. The United States did this by special enactment in the acts of 1869 and 1870, when the bonds were refunded. But for the first time in the history of the world this Administration, failing and refusing to exercise the sovereignty which belongs to the nation, has been paying a premium upon the indebtedness of the Government.

In marked contrast with the actions of Secretary Fairchild is that of Mr. Goschen, the financial minister of Great Britain, called there the chancellor of the exchequer, but occupying a similar position in that government to what Mr. Fairchild does in this. Mr. Goschen found, when the present Parliament assembled, a surplus in the treasury of Great Britain. He found that money could be obtained at a lower rate of interest than what Great Britain was paying on its consols. Mr. Goschen at once notified the holders of all the three classes of English bonds that he intended to reduce the interest from 3 to 2½ per cent., and he allowed the holders of these 3 percents one quarter of 1 per cent. premium, provided they exchanged their bonds within a certain period of time; and they have accepted Mr. Goschen's proposition. The entire debt of Great Britain has been refunded at 2½ per cent., a premium of only a quarter of 1 per cent. being paid for all the exchange. Mr. Fairchild is paying 25 to 27 per cent. premium on bonds of the United States, when, besides the universal law which authorizes nations to cancel their indebtedness at any time, there is a specific contract made with the holders of the United States bonds that the debt may be canceled or refunded upon contingencies which have already arrived.

Mr. Chairman, there is one other subject in which the people of my State, the people of my section, and the people of this country are all interested. Intelligence is the foundation-stone upon which free governments must be rested or they are in the condition of that building that was erected upon the sands, which, when the floods came and the rains descended, was swept away. Any free government not founded upon intelligence will be swept away and destroyed. A table which I append to my remarks shows how many of the people of the country are incapable of reading and writing. It shows how many in each State are incapable. A bill has been introduced and passed in the Senate of the United States which provides, out of the abundance of money in the Treasury, aid for each State to educate its ignorant. This aid is continued over a period of nine years and amounts to $77,000,000. It is given to the States in proportion to the number in each State incapable of reading and writing. This bill has come to this body. It has been referred to a committee and there it lies sleeping a sleep as sound as that which comes to those who pass away from this existence into another.

The Committee on Education has charge of this bill. It is composed of Messrs. CANDLER of Georgia, MAHONEY of New York, CRAIN of Texas, CARUTH of Kentucky, BUCKALEW of Pennsylvania, LANE of Illinois, COBB of Alabama, PENINGTON of Delaware, Democrats; and O'DONNELL of Michigan, TAYLOR of Ohio, RUSSELL of Connecticut, BELDEN of New York, and WHITE of Indiana, Republicans. I want the people of this country to read these names. I want them to know that these Democrats are denying to the ignorant children of the country benefits of education. I want them to know that at the behest of Grover Cleveland JOHN GRIFFIN CARLISLE, the Speaker of this House, stocked a committee as dexterously as the most proficient gambler would a deck of cards to prevent the passage of a bill which would give the benefits of education to the ignorant. But, Mr. Chairman, that is in accord with Democratic ideas. It is the ignorant and vicious to whom they are indebted for power, and thus they properly encourage ignorance and viciousness.

The State of North Carolina, which I have the honor to represent in part, would receive of the money appropriated by this bill $5,749,121. Instead of the present average of fifty-four school days in the year we could more than double the term. Instead of sending only 148,000 children to school we could send all who are now growing up in ignorance.

Instead of the terrible reproach of having 464,000 of our people over ten years of age who can not write their names, and 368,000 who can not read their Bibles, all would be able to do so.

The district which honors me with a seat in this Congress has 40,968 voters, and I say it with profound regret and mortification that not one-half the children in that district have the privilege of attending school. We have done all we could. We are doing the best that is possible for us to do. It is not the will but the ability that is wanting, and the $791,766 that district would receive under this bill would provide the means of education for all of them.

Mr. Chairman, in the name of the poor ignorant children of the South I denounce the men who are strangling this bill as the enemies of the Republic; as the enemies of free government. I denounce the party which sends such men to legislate for the country as unfit to make laws.

On behalf of the thirty thousand children in my district who are growing up in ignorance for the want of school facilities, I demand the passage of this bill. I present a table showing the population in my district, schools, scholars who attend, children of school age who can not attend, and the amount of money that would be given to us by the passage of this measure, "the Blair bill:"

Counties.	Population.	No. of voters.	No. of schools.	No. of children attending school.	No. of children not attending school.	Amount of money under Blair bill.

NOTE.—Later returns may slightly change these figures, but they are substantially correct.

Mr. Chairman, the people of this country are not in sympathy with these Democratic policies. They do not believe in free trade. They do believe in protection, and the result is that in November, when the people speak, the free-trade party will once more be driven from power, as it ought to be.

Mr. Chairman, the Democratic party poses as the friend of the workingman. The author and the advocates of this bill declare it is in the interest of the workingman. They even hope to induce workingmen to believe them. With tears in their eyes and supplication in their voices they say to the laborers, "Behold your friends! Look at us; we love you as dearly as a wolf loves mutton." They throw their arms round the workingman and while holding him proceed to reduce him to pauperism by legislation which reduces his wages to the starvation rates paid in Europe.

But, Mr. Chairman, the workingmen of this country will not be deceived by these false pretenses. They are men of brains as well as muscle. They know that upon their intelligent labor rests the prosperity of the nation. They know that only through protection can they obtain wages which lead to independence and the means of education, which leads to intelligence.

Mr. Chairman, the great body of mechanics and workingmen in this country will never submit to the wholesale destruction of American industries, and have their wages reduced to a level with the pauper labor of Europe, and political parties will do well to be warned in time. The party that attempts it will, and deservedly so, be utterly crushed out of existence.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Chairman, during the course of the debate on the pending bill my colleague from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] made the following statement in his speech:

If we place our great wool interest in competition with the cheap land and labor of Australasia and South America we shall destroy it, and then prices will increase and we shall be at the mercy of the foreign wool-grower.

As one of the Representatives from the great State of Illinois, I can not suffer this statement to go unchallenged. I deny the proposition, and aver that the history of the wool interest does not warrant the conclusion. I will read from the Chicago Tribune, a Republican paper published in Illinois, now supporting Gresham for President, an article reviewing this statement, and I think completely answering it:

Congressman CANNON, of the Danville district of this State made, if correctly reported, a singular argument in support of continued needlessly high tariff taxation. He is quoted as having declared that he would take $24,000,000 off the whisky and tobacco taxes, make sugar free, and pay a bounty of 2 cents a pound on the home product of sugar, thus doing away with eighty-six millions of the Treasury surplus, and making it impossible to reduce tariff taxation on clothing of the people and other like necessaries of life.

Is this the "reduction of the surplus" and the "correction of the inequalities of the tariff" promised by the Republican party in its platform of 1884? Mr. CANNON is also reported as opposing any reduction of the wool duties or of the enormous duties on woolen clothing, blankets, etc., declaring that "three-fourths of the wool consumed in the United States is produced here," and that to put wool on the free-list would destroy sheep-raising in the United States.

Mr. CANNON fails to take any account of the wool in the $50,000,000 worth of woolen goods imported annually—a singular omission. In fact, half the wool consumed in the United States must be imported, because the quantity and quality demanded can not be produced here, and therefore must be obtained from abroad in the form of wool or cloth, notwithstanding the high tariff tax. Why, then, tax sixty millions of consumers so heavily on articles they must have and can not obtain at home?

This paper says further:

Where can sheep husbandry be cheaper than in the Southwestern Territories, where grazing is free or land rent only nominal, no winter feeding required, and the labor employed that of cheap Mexican greasers and shepherd dogs? It is this competition which has virtually destroyed sheep husbandry for wool in twenty States east of the Missouri, including Mr. CANNON'S own State. There are not 50,000 sheep in all Mr. CANNON'S district, and they are raised only for mutton—the fleece will not pay half the cost of keeping. Granting all the bounty that is claimed, the farmers of Mr. CANNON'S district can not receive more than 50 cents a sheep or $25,000 per annum from the 43 per cent. wool bounties now imposed.

Free wool, however, would reduce the cost of clothing to the 175,000 people he represents an average of at the very least $3 each, a saving to the district of $525,000, or twenty-one times as much as Mr. CANNON'S few constituents who raise sheep can possibly gain by keeping up the present wool tax. Why, then, does Mr. CANNON favor retaining the wool tax so that his constituents may gain $25,000 when its repeal would save them twenty-one times that amount? Will he please explain? Why would he pay bounties to sugar-growers of Louisiana in preference to grain-growers or hog and cattle growers of Illinois? Don't Illinois farmers need better prices for their crops? Why would he readjust whisky and tobacco taxes in such a manner that whisky and tobacco middlemen will pocket every cent of the repealed tax? And so that there can be no reduction of the taxes on the kitchen, the taxes on the bed-chamber or sitting-room, the taxes on the wardrobe, and the taxes on the sick room, all of which are excessively high and still up to the war standard?

Mr. CANNON in this speech clearly commits himself to cheaper whisky and high wool, which is in perfect harmony with his colleagues on the other side of this Chamber. I respectfully submit that these principles will not be entertained by the people of Illinois.

I am ready to concede that this is the issue tendered by the Republican party in the coming campaign; but there can be no question as to where the masses of the people will be found. They can not and will not accept cheap whisky in preference to free wool. The Republican party wants to reduce the internal-revenue tax. The Democratic party says that the taxes should be reduced on the necessaries of life.

What does the President say in his late message to this House?

He says in regard to the whisky and tobacco tax as follows:

It must be conceded that none of the things subjected to internal-revenue taxation are, strictly speaking, necessaries. There appears to be no just complaint of this taxation by the consumers of these articles, and there seems to be nothing so well able to bear the burden without hardship to any portion of the people.

The President here does not seem to agree with Mr. Blaine that tobacco is one of the necessaries of life; nor does he agree with the gentleman from Illinois that whisky should be made cheaper. Now, what does the President say in regard to wool? He says in his message:

The farmer and the agriculturist, who manufacture nothing, but who pay the increased price which the tariff imposes, upon every agricultural implement, upon all he wears and upon all he uses and owns, except the increase of his flocks and herds and such things as his husbandry produces from the soil, is invited to aid in maintaining the present situation; and he is told that a high duty on imported wool is necessary for the benefit of those who have sheep to shear, in order that the price of their wool may be increased.

They of course are not reminded that the farmer who has no sheep is by this scheme obliged, in his purchases of clothing and woolen goods, to pay a tribute to his fellow-farmer as well as to the manufacturer and merchant; nor is any mention made of the fact that the sheep-owners themselves and their households must wear clothing and use other articles manufactured from the wool they sell at tariff prices, and thus as consumers must return their share of this increased price to the tradesman.

I think it may be fairly assumed that a large proportion of the sheep owned by the farmers throughout the country are found in small flocks numbering from twenty-five to fifty. The duty on the grade of imported wool which these sheep yield is 10 cents each pound if of the value of 30 cents or less, and 12 cents if of the value of more than 30 cents. If the liberal estimate of 6 pounds be allowed for each fleece, the duty thereon would be 60 or 72 cents, and this may be taken as the utmost enhancement of its price to the farmer by reason of this duty.

Eighteen dollars would thus represent the increased price of the wool from twenty-five sheep and $36 that from the wool of fifty sheep; and at present values this addition would amount to about one-third of its price. If upon its sale the farmer receives this or a less tariff profit, the wool leaves his hands charged with precisely that sum, which in all its changes will adhere to it until it reaches the consumer. When manufactured into cloth and other goods and material for use, its cost is not only increased to the extent of the farmer's tariff profit, but a further sum has been added for the benefit of the manufacturer under the operation of other tariff laws. In the mean time the day arrives when the farmer finds it necessary to purchase woolen goods and material to clothe himself and family for the winter.

When he faces the tradesman for that purpose he discovers that he is obliged not only to return in the way of increased prices his tariff profit on the wool he sold, and which then perhaps lies before him in manufactured form, but that he must add a considerable sum thereto to meet a further increase in cost caused by a tariff duty on the manufacture. Thus in the end he is aroused to the fact that he has paid upon a moderate purchase, as a result of the tariff scheme, which, when he sold his wool, seemed so profitable, an increase in price more than sufficient to sweep away all the tariff profit he received upon the wool he produced and sold.

When the number of farmers engaged in wool-raising is compared with all the farmers in the country, and the small proportion they bear to our population is considered; when it is made apparent that, in the case of a large part of those who own sheep, the benefit of the present tariff on wool is illusory; and, above all, when it must be conceded that the increase of the cost of living, caused by such tariff, becomes a burden upon those with moderate means, and the poor, the employed and unemployed, the sick and the well, and the young and old, and that it constitutes a tax which, with relentless grasp, is fastened upon the clothing of every man, woman, and child in the land, reasons are suggested why the removal or reduction of this duty should be included in a revision of our tariff laws.

Can there be a doubt who is right, the President or the learned gentleman from the Fifteenth district of Illinois? The article quoted from the Tribune shows clearly that free wool would reduce the cost of clothing to the 175,000 people in his district by at least $3 each—a saving to his district of $525,000 per annum, or to the whole State of Illinois over $10,500,000 annually, assuming that each of the twenty districts in the State is as large as the Fifteenth district. Will the people be hoodwinked any longer? The facts are before them. He who runs may read.

Again, the same paper says:

The following table will show where in this country wool-growing is profitable and where the great ranchmen with the big flocks are located—the interests that are still to be heavily protected as they wage a destructive competition against wool-growing in the States east of the Missouri. The table is for 1886:

States.	Owners.	Average flock.	Increase in five years.

Why do Congressmen like Mr. CANNON, representing farmers who have been driven out of sheep husbandry for wool alone by the undercutting competition in the far West and Southwest, still insist on big bounties for the ranchmen who are destroying wool-growing in Illinois and other States? Why do they aim to reform the tariff only by reducing internal-revenue taxes on whisky and tobacco for the benefit of middlemen, or by taking off the sugar tax and replacing it with a direct bounty taken out of the people's pockets?

These are not the measures that will relieve Western farmers, especially reducing the whisky and tobacco taxes. If Mr. CANNON desires to learn what duties can be reduced with great advantage to his constituents, who only get half prices for their hard-earned crops, and where reform can be made effective, let him study the following table showing the high war rates still levied on articles of prime necessity:

Name of article.	Use.	Taxes on each $100 worth.

I suppose it will not be denied by any one that a duty on wool increases the price of that commodity. If, then, the present duty is taken off, the same logic will show that it will be cheaper; and, if cheaper, then the price of all woolen goods which the farmer and laborer of Illinois must buy will be cheaper. In our Northern climate wool is an indispensable article of daily consumption to protect our people from the cold winds of the prairies. It shelters them by day from the winter's blast, and covers them at night when the light of the fire is extinguished.

The life of the farmer and laborer of Illinois without the protection of woolen clothing would be insupportable, and it will be difficult for them to understand why any person interested in making laws in their interest should favor a law that would necessarily increase the price of their clothing, and especially so now as their wheat crops to a great extent have failed and the great majority of the Illinois farmers are largely indebted, and the proposition to reduce the price of whisky and tobacco would seem to me at this time to be a mockery of their misfortunes. No, Mr. Chairman, this is not what the people of Illinois want, and I know what I am speaking about; but it is the best time in the world to make the clothing of the people cheaper, and this can be done by taking the duty off wool.

I affirm that the most offensive result of the wool duty is to keep out such wools as we can not produce and which are absolutely necessary in the manufacture of woolen goods. Mr. George William Bond, of Boston, who contributed an article on the development of wool manufactures in the United States to the special wool report of the bureau of statistics, in answer to a question whether any wool is imported that can not be grown here, said:

"In reply I would say that there are none of the third-class wools that can be grown in this country to advantage. * * * It is more difficult to explain so as to be readily understood why we can not produce any particular grades of first-class wools. We may grow wool in some places equally fine and apparently as good in other respects as wools that are imported, but they may not have the same working qualities. * * *

"Such is the influence of climate and soil upon wool that no two places can grow wool exactly alike. * * * We raise, comparatively to the demand, a small portion of first-class combing and delaine wool, and very little, even of this, has the characteristics required to make the finest goods which fashion demands from France and England. Without the same wools that are used there these goods can not be made here."

In order to manufacture woolen goods for sale at low prices to home consumers as well as to ship abroad in competition with foreign manufacturers we must have cheap raw wool, and it is utterly impossible to grow what we need in this country. Instead of destroying the American prices of wool it is proposed to afford a home market for the home product, which is increased by the importation of foreign wool to mix with home-grown wool.

Free raw wool will be an advantage to the importer, the manufacturer, the consumer, and most of the growers, except a few who are perfectly willing to sell inferior wool at high prices and raise the cost of every blanket in the country. No duty upon any imported article is more indefensible and bears heavier than the tariff on wool, which taxes everybody to no lasting purpose.

Mr. Chairman, I will send to the Clerk's desk and have read an article of recent date from the Missouri Republican, which bears on this question:

THE ADVANTAGE OF FREE WOOL.

Fifteen years ago D. D. Wells, a Republican, and one of the best authorities in this country on the subject of tariff and taxation, boldly asserted that a high tariff on foreign wool, instead of being an advantage to the American wool-grower, is a positive disadvantage—first, because it deprived home manufacturers of foreign wools and prevented that mixture of different wools which has become an art in the manufacture; and second, because it discourages the home manufacturer of woolen goods, invites foreign goods, and thereby breaks down the home market for home wool.

The wool duty can be made high enough to make the manufacture of woolen goods nearly impossible in competition with foreign rivals who have the advantage on free wool—and when this point is reached the home demand for wool disappears.

A careful review of the domestic wool trade for a series of years, under different tariffs, by Mr. Rowland Hazard, a large woolen manufacturer of Rhode Island, goes far to confirm this opinion, and to indicate that the wool-growing interests would thrive as well, perhaps better, under a free-wool arrangement than under a high duty.

There was a high duty—50 to 60 per cent.—on wool from 1867 to 1872, inclusive; and yet the wool-clip of the country, instead of increasing under it, actually fell off from 177,000,000 pounds to 146,000,000 pounds. In 1872 the duty was reduced from 45 to 55 per cent., and the clip began to increase under the reduction, growing from 146,000,000 pounds in 1871 to 208,000,000 in 1877.

Immediately after the enactment of the high tariff of 1867, says Mr. Hazard, "the number of sheep in the great wool-growing States began to decline." The total number in the United States in 1867 was 39,385,000; in 1877 it was only 35,804,000, a falling off of 3,581,000.

In Ohio the number ran down from 7,159,000 in 1867 to 3,783,000 in 1878; in Michigan from 3,473,000 to 2,320,000; in Pennsylvania from 3,230,000 to 1,785,000; in New York from 5,117,000 to 1,732,000; in Indiana from 2,783,000 to 1,111,000; in Illinois from 2,446,000 to 1,026,000; in Iowa from 1,550,000 to 482,000—the decrease in these eight States being from 26,829,000 to 14,761,000, or nearly one-half.

It is true the number of sheep in the country is now increasing, and has been for several years past, but it is under the very wool duty which the Ohio sheep farmers complain of as too low. It is now 48,000,000.

Another curious fact shown by Mr. Hazard's tables is that the best average prices of wool were during the comparative free-trade era from 1857 to 1860, when they ranged from 49 to 59 cents a pound. So far from the high tariff of 1867 benefiting the wool-grower by enhancing the price of wool, it had the very opposite effect.

The price began to decline immediately, and did not recover until the "wool famine" in 1871–72.

Our wool clip at present is valued at $85,000,000, and it is not as much as we need by one-half. We require a large amount of woolen clothing, and if we do not make it ourselves we must import a portion of it from abroad.

But it makes no difference to the wool-grower whether the wool we import is in a raw state or in the form of manufactured goods; it competes with home-grown wool in the latter form just as much as in the other.

To secure a good home market for the wool-growers we must encourage the manufacture of woolen goods and the consumption of them at home, and this can be more effectually done by admitting wool free of duty than by placing on it a high duty that manufacturers are not able to pay and compete with foreign rivals.

Besides, the sixty-odd millions of consumers of woolen clothing have something to say in the matter; they demand cheaper woolen clothing, and the demand is certainly reasonable.

Mr. Chairman, the farmers of Illinois at least think the demand is reasonable, and the man who does not comply with the demand will be asked the reason why, which he will not be perhaps able to give.

But, Mr. Chairman, my colleague is not alone in his position on the wool question. The eloquent and gifted gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], the Republican member of the Ways and Means Committee, said in this debate:

The great wool-growing industry of the country, only in the infancy of its development [?], was to be exposed to a "ruinous" foreign competition which would surely prove its destruction. The majority tried to delude the people into the belief that free wool meant cheap clothing.

He admitted that wool would be cheaper while our foreign rivals were trying to destroy our industry, but when they had eliminated from our market the production of 300,000,000 pounds of domestic wool, we would find ourselves bound hand and foot at the mercy of the foreign producer. What restraint would there be then on his power or cupidity?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will send to the Clerk's desk and have read what the Chicago Tribune says of this statement by Mr. BURROWS:

If Mr. BURROWS desires a "parallel" to this absurd and ridiculous argument he can find it in the tariff debates of 1857 preceding the adoption of the Republican act which placed nearly all kinds of wool on the free-list. A few benighted Congressmen predicted blue ruin, and "being bound hand and foot by foreigners," as glibly or as hoarsely as Mr. BURROWS does now, but the result was that during the four years following the free-listing of wool that product commanded the best maintained prices for any consecutive four years in the history of the country.

How does BURROWS get around that fact. A slight wool duty was imposed in 1861, a stronger one in 1862, and so on until the high protective duties of 1867 were reached. Under the latter wool has sagged down in price, and the number of sheep in the States between New York and Nebraska has decreased nearly one-half. Mr. BURROWS's own State of Michigan had in 1867, when the high wool duty was imposed, 4,028,767 sheep, while in 1880, after enjoying thirteen years of high protection, only 1,930,656 remained alive. How does Mr. BURROWS explain that?

Mr. BURROWS ought to know that the United States is the only civilized country that now thinks of levying an import tax on such a product as wool. No country produces all the varieties of wool needed for mixing in making fine woolen goods, and hence when the import is free woolen manufacturing has a great advantage, and the demand even for the home product is strengthened. The lack of wool duties has not "ruined" sheep husbandry in England, France or Germany, and did not in this country when, under virtual free trade in wool, prices were better than at present and better maintained through terms of years than they ever were under high protection.

If Mr. BURROWS desires another "parallel" to his ultra-protectionist harangue he can find it in the outeries of 1867, when the import duty was taken off raw cotton. During the war the cotton manufacturers of Europe found their supply of raw material from the United States cut off, and in order to keep their mills going extraordinary and quite successful efforts were made to stimulate cotton growing in India, and it was predicted that the competition so developed would overwhelm and ruin the planters of the United States if our ports were made free.

Nevertheless, cotton was put on the free-list in 1867 by a Republican Congress, and the results have been satisfactory to everybody concerned. Considerable cotton is imported, but it is of varieties not produced in the United States, and is needed for mixing purposes by our cotton factories—just as would be the case if wool were free.

Mr. BURROWS could find another "parallel" to his argument in the howling and bawling that took place in 1867, when it was proposed to put hides and skins on the free-list. The "ruin" of the cattle and calf crop was predicted and startling arrays of figures were paraded to show the irreparable injury that would be inflicted on the country.

Nevertheless hides were put on the free-list by the same Republican Congress that put raw cotton on the free-list, and the consequence was that boots and shoes were cheapened to the whole people, and leather manufacturers were enabled to build up a valuable foreign export trade, increase their product, and employ far more labor and at better wages, while no injury whatever was done to the cattle industry. The export of leather goods last year amounted to $10,436,138 and the year before nine millions.

But conceding for the sake of the argument BURROWS's false and foolish claim that the wool duty is added to the wool's price and benefits sheep-growers to that extent, why does he propose taxing his constituents four or five times as much in the extra cost of their woolen goods as they can possibly get from the wool duty even as he figures it?

BURROWS's claim that if the duty were removed sheep husbandry would cease in the United States, and after the sheep had all disappeared foreign woolgrowers would hold a monopoly and force up the price, is a piece of rot and more absurd than the other Congressional chestnuts which BURROWS has been airing in the recent debate. See how the record demolishes his false statements of "ruin." For many years preceding 1856 the duty on wool was 30 per cent. ad valorem. In 1857 the Republican House agreed to put all wool on the free-list except the costliest grades. The average price in Boston from 1847 to 1881 was thus quoted:

Year.	Duty.	Gold, per pound.
	Per cent.	Cents.
1854	30	49½
1857	Free	53
1864	25 to 30	45
1865	25 to 30	46
1867	50 to 60	46
1876	45 to 55	44

Now compare the prices of wool under the 30 per cent. protection duties from 1847 to the time of placing wool on the free-list in 1857. Do they show that the loss of the duty "ruined" the price of wool, as Mr. BURROWS asserts? Nothing of the kind. On the contrary, the price increased, while the cost of clothing was reduced to the people.

When the progressingly heavy war duties began to be imposed in 1864, was the effect to add the duty to the price of wool? Not at all. Wool declined rather than advanced. In what a sorry plight do these facts from the record leave Mr. BURROWS!

Mr. Chairman, these two gentlemen speak the opinion of the Republican party in this House. Are they correct and will the people sustain them? I believe not. I believe when wool will be put on the free-list—and it will—the result will be a large increase in manufacturing, a large addition to the number of operatives employed, and a large increase to the farmer, and a reduction of more than 25 per cent. in the price to the people who have to purchase woolen clothing.

Mr. Chairman, the passage of the Mills bill by this Congress means cheaper clothing, cheaper houses, and cheaper food for the people. It means more prosperity to the farmer and laborer. It means the putting down of monopolies and trusts. It means the triumphant election of Grover Cleveland, this fall, as President of the United States. It means the perpetuation of Democratic supremacy, and the eternal principles of truth and justice. [Applause.]

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. LYMAN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue and had come to no resolution thereon.

On motion of Mr. MONTGOMERY (at 10 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until 10 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 18, 1888.

The House met at 10 o'clock a. m.

The House was called to order by Mr. McMILLIN, who stated that the Speaker was unavoidably absent, and directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 18, 1888.

I hereby designate Hon. BENTON McMILLIN to preside at the session of the House to-day.

JNO. G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read in part.

On motion of Mr. McKINLEY, the reading of the remainder of the Journal was dispensed with.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HOOKER, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for ten days, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

On motion of Mr. MILLS the reference of bills and communications upon the Speaker's table was postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order, and I move that the morning hour for the call of committees for reports be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. I now ask unanimous consent that gentlemen having reports to present from committees may send them to the Clerk's desk and have them duly referred.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

FILING OF REPORT.

The following report was filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

RELIEF OF SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Mr. BROWER, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9956) for the relief of certain soldiers and sailors of the late war; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TARIFF.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the highest duty of the statesman in this country, where we proceed upon the theory of the equality of man, is to assist as best he may in maintaining the equality of the nation's forces. It is for the reason that within the last few years, and following close upon the heels of a mighty martial struggle wherein the further perfection of our fundamental idea of government was the leading thought, we have drifted unwittingly, at least on the part of the masses, into a species of class legislation that is discriminating between the industries of men, thus nullifying the fruits of the victories we have gained in the direction of legally equalizing men, and subverting the underlying principles of our Government, that I have been an attentive and interested listener to the debate that has been in progress upon the measure pending before the House.

The discussion has already taken a wide range, and the inspiring feature of it is found in the fact that this discussion of tariff reform, so quietly begun, is destined to widen until it embraces the whole brood of tariffs of every description in this tariff-ridden country. And this debate is none the less important for the reason that it was inaugurated in the interest of relief from but one of the important tariffs of the long list of unjust tariffs that are inflicted upon the people of this country in the interest of special lines of business and industries. This discussion is not only serving a great purpose in exposing these various tariffs, levied in the interest of the few upon the many, in their proper character and nature, and showing them all akin, being of a common parentage, greed, and sustained by a common method, the elimination of the principle of competition from the commerce of the country; but it is important in this, that it is stripping the mask from the face of fraudulent pretense and placing individuals as well as parties before the people for what they are rather than for what they profess to be. Through this debate and the discussion that it will inevitably lead to throughout the country there will be thrown a flood of light where light has long been sorely needed; and in this light the people of this country will see the real issues in which they are interested and be the better enabled to draw a line between their friends and their foes without accepting blindly as conclusive the party label on the sleeve.

And in the light that must come from a discussion of this tariff question in all its varied forms party lines will be reformed and political organizations will come to stand for living, vital, modern questions as well as sacred memories, and the beginning of the end of the days of the politician who has exalted past party virtue for the sole purpose of obscuring the present vicious methods in vogue everywhere in the commerce of the country will have come.

The great battle between monopoly and competition has begun, and in my judgment will be waged until the people shall have gained well-defined victory with practical and enduring beneficial results over the commercial monsters that have been too largely dominating the country, dictating its officiary, and shaping its legislation.

Grave abuses exist everywhere in the name of commerce, and through these abuses colossal fortunes, aggregating an undue proportion of the nation's wealth, have been placed in the hands of a few individuals at the expense of the many.

And thus, in this Republic, founded on the principles of the equality of all men and industries before the law, we find that the grossest inequalities of the nation's forces have been built up through great commercial agencies exercising unrestrainedly in their right as their own private property the sovereign powers of the Government, which belong alone to the whole people.

This sovereign power of the people has been let to the banks to control the people's money, to the railroads to control the transportation of the people's commerce, to the telegraph to control the transmission and dissemination of the people's news, and to the jobbers and the manufacturers to control the prices of the people's food and clothing and the other necessities of life, until we find the Government an indorser without profit in all these gigantic agencies wielded by individual hands, directed by individual heads, in the sole interest of strictly private citizens.

This class of men, panoplied with the usurpation of this sovereign power, have so far abused their trust as to be wrongfully extorting from the body of the people and putting into their own private coffers more than a billion annually of the people's hard-earned money. This monstrous condition of affairs has borne its legitimate fruit, and we see springing up everywhere as the hateful progeny of this usurpation innumerable modern monsters, known as "trusts," all like their more respectable, and for that reason more dangerous, predecessors, sired by greed and damed by contrivance that eliminates from American commerce the vital principle of honest competition. And through the demoralization that has resulted from this course of commercial conduct we have reached a point where lead in the dice represents the genius of American enterprise and the Government of the United States is looked to as the common agent to place the dice or keep watchful ward over the agency that does. And all this in the sacred name of the development of the commerce and the industries of the country and to protect American labor. No business enterprise in this day of pools, tariffs, and trusts is regarded as worthy the attention of a really great business man that does not afford its proprietor some undue advantage over his competitors and his customers, enabling him to drive the former out of business and to compel the latter to deal with him on such terms as he shall dictate with no other limitation on his greed than his own sense of policy may suggest.

That this principle is as actively present under the practical operation of a tariff levied with a view to protection as it is under the operations of a pooling arrangement between railroad companies or trust combines, by which they forestall the market value of the articles and commodities in which they deal, is so self-evident that it needs no proof. In both instances the object is the extinction of competition, and the difference between the two is one of degree measured by the distance each halts short of reaching a point of absolute prohibition. That one relates to foreign and the other to domestic trade can make no sort of difference so far as the principle of discrimination is concerned. All concede that as to domestic affairs the principle is odious and not to be tolerated, but as to foreign affairs some contend that it is a blessing for which we should all be devoutly thankful. That there is a distinction between being extorted from by home-folk and those you know and by foreigners and mere strangers, I am willing to concede; but that there is such a distinction as to convert that which is crime in the former to benefaction in the latter I most emphatically deny, and I need only call up the farmer of the West, and especially those in the district which I have the honor to represent, who are paying the coupons of pool and protection agents, which are contrived on and clipped from every industry and calling they pursue, in order to furnish an unbroken line of testimony in support of the proposition I here affirm. A more fertile and Heaven-favored country God in His most generous mood never made than that which the farmers of the West occupy; and a more honest, intelligent, sober, economical, and industrious people can not be found among the civilized peoples of the earth than are to-day tilling the soil of this great fertile West.

But notwithstanding Heaven's favor and their own inherent virtue, the balance of trade is against that section of country, and the mortgages that plaster the homes of the people stand for the difference, and represent the price they pay through one protective contrivance and another, like the pool, for the development of every "home" industry save their own. They pay the extortionate rates of the railroad pool, the telegraph pool, the insurance pool, the coal pool, the coal-oil pool, the corn pool, the wheat pool, the lumber pool, the salt pool, the sugar pool, the manufacturers' pool, the jobbers' pool, and the various other pools of this pool-cursed country, and then, in consequence of the necessities created by this series of exhaustive processes, they are compelled to borrow their own money back from another class of pool agents at extortionate rates of interest. This is the same principle that our protection friends grow so fervidly eloquent about as it works in that portion of our country characterized by some Eastern friend, no doubt an ardent protectionist, as the "rowdy West."

Our farmers in the West are more and more coming to understand that the beauties of protection, as portrayed by its advocates, relate to the condition of those who are the beneficiaries of the system, and not to those who foot the bills. But do not understand from what I here say, as to the balance of trade being against the farmers of the West and as to mortgages that rest upon their homes to meet that balance, that the people of that section of the country are in a forlorn and hopeless condition. I mean nothing of the kind. The farmers of the West are a proud, and, considering their condition, a prosperous people, and with a fair fight a great future before them. But what I do mean to say is that there is unjust discrimination against them; that there are unjust and onerous limitations placed upon them and their industry, and that the contest that they are engaged in with the agents of the protective pools of the country, backed by the sovereign power of the Government, is an unequal contest. And it is for the reason that the discussion of that phase of protection involved in the pending measure will arrest the attention of the public and lead to the discussion of protection in general that I hail with unfeigned pleasure the present debate.

When the smoke of battle shall have lifted from the field and the people calmly and dispassionately consider the facts as they shall then appear, they will see that a pool is a pool; that a trust is a trust; that protection is protection, whether relating to foreign or domestic concerns, the leading, vital principle of the life of all of them being the extinction of the principle of competition. Protection without proper restraint means monopoly, and both mean death to the most vital and efficacious principle of American commerce—competition. Competition means fair play, monopoly means foul play; and it means foul play on the highest authority, for it surrounds men with conditions of temptation that subvert all honesty and lead us up to where we can appreciate as never before, perhaps, the full force and meaning of that portion of the Lord's Prayer which prescribes the absence of temptation as the condition on which man shall gain the kingdom of heaven. But as odious as the principle may be, its application may be at times, and doubtless is as necessary in the complex affairs of state as the deadly poisons are necessary in the practice of the life-saving science of medicine.

But happily for the country the time has come when the farmers of the great West have such time for thought and action with reference to their own affairs as to see to it that a line of policy is marked out that has a tendency to equalize the burdens and the benefits between the different sections of the country and the industries peculiar to each. And speaking for myself as a citizen of one of the great commonwealths of the West, which I have the honor in part to represent, I will say that the West will meet this question in the broad-minded, generous spirit with which she has ever come to the discharge of all her duties to the Republic, but in so doing she will endeavor to disabuse the minds of our Eastern protection friends of the impression they seem to have gained, from the expressions of Western representatives with Eastern ideas, that we are such dull, obtuse, and easily deceived people as not to be able to tell a burden from a blessing, and that in acquiescing in the policy of a tariff for revenue with incidental protection we are doing it in obedience to duty, undeceived by the sophistries of the modern protectionist, who is ready to ascribe to his idol all the blessings that have come to man in this goodly-land. The matter of tax-paying is business and not pleasure, and no amount of sophistry can make it seem otherwise.

The Secretary of the Treasury estimates the needs of the Government for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1888, and ending June, 1889, at $326,530,000. He also estimates that there will come into the Treasury within that time from—

Internal revenue	120,000,000
All other sources	35,000,000
Making a total of	383,000,000

being $56,470,000 in excess of the needs of the Government for the ensuing year.

All, or nearly all, agree that there should be such a recast of the revenue laws of the country as to leave that excess of $56,470,000 in the pockets of the men whose rightful property it is.

All, or nearly all, agree that the obligations of the Government, economically administered, are the just measure of taxation.

To meet these obligations is stern business, and no array of figures nor labyrinths of statistics can obscure the fact that the identical people who pay this great sum of $326,530,000 are the people who buy the articles on which this burden directly and indirectly rests. This much is clear, and the protectionist, feeling that the burden is on him to do so, in view of this mighty contribution to his business of $228,000,000 by the consumers of his goods, endeavors to show by one intellectual invention and another that each of these contributors to protection has had a benefit in the development of home industries and the increased wages of labor.

Concede this statement to be literally true, and it is the most nonsensical investment that a people ever made, of two hundred and twenty-eight millions of money. Look at a few figures and contemplate a few facts deducible therefrom, and you will reach the conclusion that as a mere investment the proprietors of this cash had better bought stock in the Standard Oil Trust or have started a new one on their own hook. According to the Tenth Census—

The whole population was	50,155,783
Total number engaged in manufactures and mining	3,837,112

Here we have 46,348,671 people paying $186,522,065 of money to maintain an increase in the wages of 3,837,112, or at the rate of $48.61 + per head for every man, woman, and child thus employed, or $4.02 per head for the 46,348,671; or for the Congressional district which I have the honor to represent, the farmers would have paid the enormous sum of $683,400 for the development of industries they did not own and to increase the wages of people they did not employ. And on the estimates of this year by the Secretary of the Treasury the amount of import duties will reach $228,000,000, which will amount to $4.27 for every man, woman, and child in the United States, or $725,900 for my Congressional district. But we can not concede only momentarily for the sake of argument the claims of the protectionists. Our farmers know that as a common contribution to our country the development of industries in which they have no pecuniary interest is something to be proud of, but they know that glory as a diet is exceedingly thin, and that as raiment it is too diaphanic for the temperature in which they live to be of any value.

And, Mr. Chairman, as to the claim that protection increases the price of labor, I have something to say. In the first place I deny that we are indebted to the tariff in any degree for the difference in wages in this country and in Europe. And in the second place, conceding for argument's sake the point, I deny that the pending measure proposes any such reduction of duties on imports as to interfere in the slightest degree with the wages of those employed in this country in the production of dutiable articles, and on these points I desire to submit proof which, in my judgment, conclusively sustains them both. The higher wages paid labor in this country are due to several causes, and none of those the tariff, for while on that specious pretext the manufacturers have been protected to an extent that enabled them to execute their purpose, they have, in every instance, proved recreant to their professions of friendship to labor, and have taken the proceeds of the protective legislation, generously given them in the interest of their workmen, and coolly put it in their own pockets; and as the absence of evidence is sometimes as strong as affirmative proof, I point to the remarkable fact that the entire history of protective legislation, so far as my research goes, fails to disclose a single instance where the wages of the laborer in a given industry were increased by reason of the imposition of an import duty or the increase of a duty already imposed.

It is true that as to this question, as to most others, they present columns of figures showing that wages in this country are higher than in other countries, and then presumptuously claim the difference as a trophy of protection. And while there is no proof that the tariff has anything to do with the increase of wages, there are many circumstances, like the varying wages in adjacent cities with the same tariff conditions, that abundantly prove that the lion's share of the benefits (as is notably shown in the steel-works of Edgar Thomson) given the American manufacturer goes into the pockets of the rich proprietor. Among the leading and prime conditions which account for the greater wages American laborers receive over foreign laborers is in the superiority of American labor, and on that point I submit as high protective authority an extract from a letter by Hon. W. M. EVARTS, then Secretary of State and now a Republican United States Senator from New York, transmitting to Congress May 17, 1879, the consular reports on the state of labor in Europe. He says:

> The average American workman performs from one and one-half to twice as much work in a given time as the average European workman. This is so important a point in connection with our ability to compete with the cheap labor manufactures of Europe, and it seems at first thought so strange, that I will trouble you with somewhat lengthy quotations from the reports in support thereof. * * *
> For the first time our manufactures are now assuming international proportions. At a time of universal depression we have met those nations which held a monopoly of the world's markets, met them in their strongholds, etc. * * * Within the last fifteen years we have demonstrated our ability by the brilliant development of our own resources to exclude by honest competition foreign manufactures to a large extent from our shores.

But if this superiority of American labor over the pauper labor of Europe did not more than account for the difference in wages, still the American manufacturer would have no cause of complaint against the pending bill, as the per cent of duty imposed on every article is in every instance largely in excess of the per cent. which the labor represents in the article produced in this country.

Making protection to American labor the leading ground for asking laws protecting them from foreign competition with the cheap products of pauper labor, the American people have consented to take upon themselves the great burden of adding, as the law stands at present, 47 per cent. to the price of the whole range of dutiable articles, which, taking the estimated value of such articles at $2,500,000,000, and one-half the duty as added to the price, we have the enormous sum, in round numbers, of about $600,000,000 that the American laborer should receive. The following table of statistics, prepared by Mr. Seaton, Superintendent of the Tenth Census, and extended to show the present and proposed tariff rates by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN], demonstrates the fact that as to the articles named in the table labor receives only 16.9 per cent., while the per cent. of protection demanded for it by the manufacturer and generously accorded by the people amounts to 69 per cent.:

This exhibit discloses the fact that the manufacturers have not dealt in good faith with this question, and that they have cheated both the people and their employés, or, in other words, are guilty of obtaining money under false pretenses. On this estimate they have retained 52.1 per cent. of the amount granted them on account of labor, and the mild form of punishment they receive at the hands of the pending measure, which is characterized by the protectionist advocates as "an assault upon home industries," is a reduction of duties to such a point only as leaves them an average of 40.7 per cent., or 23.8 per cent. more than the average wages the manufacturers are now paying their employés. It would seem that on this showing the American manufacturer, tempering his greed with prudence, would be less presumptuous in his demands and less offensive and provocative in his treatment of his victims.

Here he stands as the exponent of a system that has filched from the people hundreds of millions annually on one false pretense and another, not only not offering to make any restitution to the laboring men of these millions whose property it equitably and rightfully is, but is fighting with the desperation of a wild beast to prevent any modification of this great burden of extortion in the future. Protectionists might as well understand that this fight is on to a finish, and that there will be no rest in this country until this system of plundering the American people in the name of American labor shall be torn, root and branch, from our revenue policy and cast out forever. And certainly every laboring man in whose name this outrage is committed is interested in seeing this end accomplished, or at least in seeing that there is a division of the spoils in harmony with the conditions on which it is procured.

In truth, evidence multiplies on every hand that the manufacturer, the capitalist, and not the laborer, is the beneficiary of our protective system. Were it not so, Mr. Chairman, instead of bringing into this country in great numbers pauper laborers of Europe to take the place of American laborers, our protection friends would join in the movement to put a high protective duty on such labor importations and thus show themselves not only the friends of the laboring man but consistent protective tariff advocates.

And the laboring man is not such a fool as not to know that it is a much graver crime against him and his family to import pauper labor to drive him out of business or bring him down to starvation wages than it is to import merely the product of that pauper labor. Hundreds of thousands of dollars are spent by these protected industries in prepar, ing arguments bristling with statistics to show the blessings of taxing one class of people to sustain the business of another class of people, and great enterprise and ingenuity, without regard to expense, is exhibited in placing these arguments where they will do the most good.

They are made to appear as original matter in an editorial way, as the disinterested sentiments of the editor, and they are sent in season and out the year round into the homes of the farmers and others of their victims in order to hold them in a state of repose. But when the argument has ended there appears but one fact beyond the realm of doubt, and that is the fact that the consumers of dutiable articles in this country, whether they be foreign or domestic, pay in excess of what they would have to pay but for the tariff, the tariff duty whatever it may be, whether 47 per cent. as now, or more or less. In other words, if the tariff is at the rate of 47 per cent. of the value of dutiable goods the consumers pay an excess of 47 per cent. over and above what they would pay but for the tariff. The importer adds the tariff among other items to the cost of his goods, and then meets the price fixed by the American merchants on his goods, and thus the consumers in each instance pay the enhanced price, and if the amount required by consumers be three billions, one billion four hundred and ten million represents the price they have paid to aid home industries. Of course these figures may not be correct in every instance, but they are approximately so as a basis of calculation for all practical purposes in illustrating in greater or less degree the sum of the burden borne by the American people in the name of protection to American industries.

Vehement denial that the duty is added to the cost and specious arguments to show that dutiable articles are produced in this country as cheaply as abroad are all, no matter how plausible, tainted with fraud, doubt, and great uncertainty, in view of a few established facts about which there never has been any doubt. And the skeptic is altogether pardonable, for he sees the American manufacturer spending hundreds of thousands of dollars to keep the European manufacturer out of the American market, and he sees the European manufacturer so eager to get into this market that he is willing to pay about $225,000,000 per annum for the mere chance of having his products exposed in our markets. The American manufacturer is fleecing his victims at such a rate that the European manufacturer can afford to pay $225,000,000 per annum for a stand in our market-place. This is a condition and not a theory. And while there is but one single fact about which there is no controversy, and that the fact that the consumers of the classes of articles subject to duty pay the duty, all else as to offsets and the like being mere speculation on the part of the protectionist, the wiser and safer practice is to hold fast to the path marked out by the fathers of the Republican party before the various protected interests had assumed such vast proportions and had gained as undue and as dangerous a power over the minds of men as they have over the commerce and industries of the country.

The Republican party recognized this rule and applied it in legislation, and if their voice could be heard to-day a vast majority of the people (of Iowa at least) would declare in favor of a tariff for revenue, with incidental protection, in such sum as, added to the internal-revenue taxes paid in under existing laws, would meet the just obligations of the Government, honestly and economically administered. When I ask my neighbor to pay me $2 for an article, the product of my labor, that he can buy across the way for $1, there rests on me a decisive burden to explain to my neighbor how on business principles he can afford to do that thing, and the explanation will be largely in the nature of the venerable and often-told story in which a white man and an Indian and a turkey and a buzzard were the leading characters. Of the $228,000,000, the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury of the receipts of the Government for the ensuing year from tariff duties, 100,000,000 at least will be paid by the farmers, estimating their numbers at the moderate sum of 44 per cent. of the population of the United States; and they will pay it because they have to pay it as good citizens, and not for the reason that they regard it a privilege and a blessing.

They know they must bear their just proportion of the tax, and that to pay it in this disguised way, when they have some voice in determining the amount of it, more or less, as they will to buy more or less of dutiable articles, is perhaps quite as satisfactory as to pay a fixed sum over the Treasurer's counter, as they do as to State and county taxes, and which if not paid exposes their property to distraint and sale. But the tax-payers of the Eighth Iowa district, which I have the honor to represent, in paying $725,900, their proportion of the $228,000,000, the estimate for the current year, will demand that there be such a reduction of the revenues as will bring this enormous burden to the smallest possible amount. And the people of Iowa are in such earnest mood on this and kindred subjects that no amount of sophistry as to benefits accruing from protection nor juggling as to the non-partisan character of the question will induce them to forego holding individuals personally responsible for their official action. A Representative will not this year be permitted to vote with the trusts and then plead in his defense that his action was not political action.

Nothing but large and well-trained majorities, held together by force of habit, from long association and prejudice, and other than by principle, will return an Iowa member this year who, on any pretext, does not vote for a reduction of the excessive taxation that, in connection with other drains from other protected industries, is draining Iowa annually of her substance and putting $100,000,000 per annum in the Treasury more than is needed to meet the obligations of the Government. From long suffering the people have been seeking light, and, in my judgment, the time has come when the cry of "free trade" and "British gold" will no longer divert the attention of the tax-payer from the hand that, during the diversion thus created, glides deftly into his breeches pocket.

The nation is at peace within its own borders and with the world. We have had now more than three years' Democratic administration, and there is no rent in the flag and no stoppage of Union soldiers' pensions or payment of the rebel debt. The time has come when the people can look after their own private interests, as contradistinguished from public affairs, without endangering the public weal. There is no longer any call to sacrifice personal for public interests. If the regulation of the tariff, the railroads, the telegraphs, the banks, and the trusts are not political and party questions, the people will make them party questions, and men who wish to remain in public life that do not seek to find some way of putting these institutions on an equality with the ignored farmers, who stand for one-half—and the better half—of the industry of this country, to the end that the hundreds of millions that the farmers are now paying in extortionate rates into custom-houses, railroad and telegraph offices, and banks, will be notified that their services are no longer wanted.

One of the most forceful schemes on the part of this combination of interests against the people has been the non-partisan dodge by which they (the pool agents) have maintained the equality of political forces by keeping one party as deep in the mire as the other in the mud, and the people left without any inducement to change their party relations. In my own State, where I am familiar with men and methods, the audacity of the corporation bosses, who associate themselves with the dominant party for the purpose of directing its course in the interest of monopolistic power, is largely born of the fact that a few leaders admitted to the councils of the minority share with them in their devotion to monopoly as well as in the spoils that follow such devotion.

TARIFF.

For the purpose of opening up the way for men who want the benefits of belonging to party, and also want the benefits that accrue from doing those things that are in violation of party promises and party tradition, an ingenious way has been opened up that is worthy of the inventive ingenuity of the pool agents of the day. The declaration has gone out that the tariff is not a political question, and that therefore no party sin can be committed in relation to it, let the action of the individual be what it may. That this will prove as weak as most of the other propositions the agents of monopoly seek to sustain their cause with will appear when it is stated that according to Worcester's dictionary politics is defined as "the science or the art of government, or the administration of national or public affairs; that part of ethics which consists in the knowledge or practice of conducting the various affairs of a State or nation." It strikes me that raising the revenues is a part of the various "affairs" involved in "conducting the affairs of the State or nation." If on the leading question in politics, committed to the leading committee of the House, and whose chairman is conceded to be the leader of the House, party lines can not be drawn, it is a strong point made in support of the common charge, now so frequently heard everywhere, that parties have outlived their usefulness and are only able to draw the lines on historical questions, always breaking on all questions affecting banks, railroads, telegraphs, trusts, and other Government-aided enterprises that are making private merchandise of the sovereign power of the people. The tariff question is a political question, and the Republican party has so recognized it, and has a well-defined position with reference to it, notwithstanding the fact that some of its self-constituted leaders are trying to harness it up in the interest of monopoly. The party faith, as formulated in its platforms and through the utterances of party leaders, as well as the general line of legislation it has enacted since it came to power, bind the party to the policy of a tariff for revenue so adjusted as to encourage home industry. In view of the fact that the Constitution limits the tariff to the revenue needs of the Government, and the further consideration, of a practical nature in the working out of that policy under the constitutional limitation, that the annual receipts from tariff are now about $225,000,000, and that Senator SHERMAN, a protectionist, and probably, from his long experience in public affairs of a financial character, the highest authority in the land, said, in a speech delivered in 1869, that—there does not seem to be any other tenable ground for the party to stand on. The whole history of the party as a party shows this. The Whig party was the original tariff party in this country, and Henry Clay was the oracle and idol of his party in general and on that question in a special sense. Henry Clay, advocating this position from the standpoint of a patriot and as to its effect upon the whole country, asked for a temporary protective tariff for our American industries during their infancy, which is the exact position of General James A. Garfield (the last President the Republican party elected), as he defined his position on this question as being in favor of such protection as would lead to free trade. When the Whig party went into bankruptcy the Republican party fell heir to the assets, and especially to its position on the tariff; and consequently President Garfield was voicing the organic law of his party on the tariff when he declared himself in favor of only such protection as would lead to free trade.

The wit of man could not possibly devise a tariff that would yield $140,000,000 in gold without amply protecting our domestic industry—

Chester A. Arthur, elected as Vice-President upon the ticket with Garfield, and whose admirable administration as Garfield's successor received the cordial indorsement of his party and made it possible for his party to prolong its power, declared in his last annual message in favor of—such tariff reductions as may seem advisable when the result of recent revenue laws and commercial treaties shall have shown in what quarters those reductions may be most judiciously effected.

The "recent revenue laws" he there referred to as the result of the revision of 1883 were followed by increased, instead of reduced revenues, adding fresh force to his recommendation and proving the soundness of his political views. President Arthur's policy was the party policy, and that was, only such import duties as, taken in connection with the revenue from other existing sources, were needed to meet the obligations of the Government honestly administered.

The protection spoken of in the party platforms was the protection that came from a wise adjustment of the duties imposed.

President Arthur had three Secretaries of the Treasury—Charles J. Folger, of New York, an Eastern State; and General Gresham and Hugh McCulloch, of Indiana, a Western State—and all three were able and trusted leaders of the Republican party, and all three were outspoken for tariff reform.

Secretary Folger, in his report for 1883, recommended—

That the duties upon the articles used or consumed by those who are the least able to bear the burden of taxation should be reduced.

And Secretary McCulloch, in pointing out in his report the proper way in which to do this, said:

1. That the existing duties upon raw materials which are to be used in manufacture should be removed.
2. That the duties upon the articles used or consumed by those who are the least able to bear the burden of taxation should be reduced.

Again I desire to call attention to the fact, in order to emphasize it as it deserves in these days, when the launching of the mere epithet of "free-trader" is expected to successfully degrade the work of tariff reform, that President Arthur's administration was not only a Republican administration but one that won exceptional commendation from his party, that found warm and generous expression in the resolutions of every party State convention held that year. Mr. Arthur's administration was but executing Republican principles in compliance with the Republican platforms; and the Chicago Tribune, the leading Republican newspaper in the United States, when measured by its devotion to the masses as against special interests, puts the situation in a nutshell and voices the sentiments of its party in the West when it says:

Thus the last Republican administration anticipated by four years the recommendation just made to Congress by Mr. Cleveland and laid down the precise doctrine which, coming from a Democratic President, is now expected to excite the abhorrence of Republicans.

And passing from national to State affairs, I find that the record of the Republican party in Iowa is well defined as being for tariff with incidental protection; and in proof of this allegation I will submit the platform utterances of the party, as I have them at hand, until at an unfortunate moment monopolistic power largely dominated the State and, taking advantage of the great diversion from its machinations created by the agitation of the prohibitory question, stole into the party platform in 1883 a paragraph declaring against any tinkering with the tariff.

I have been a Republican from my youth up, following, in peace and war, the fortunes of my party banner without breach of discipline during all these years, save in two instances, the most notable one being when I gave my somewhat cordial support to the candidacy of an independent Republican. How many of my brethren on this side of the House can say as much? And, however much my action in these instances may be open to criticism by that class of Republicans who have just made their last return from their latest escapade into the Democratic party, it does not alter the record of the Republican party in my State nor my familiarity with it as a party to it. And I shall proceed to present it to the House.

In 1871 the Republican State convention declared—

That while we favor a just and reasonable degree of protection to all branches of American industry against foreign competition, we are unalterably opposed to any system of legislation which favors one section of the country or department of industrial enterprise at the expense of another, and therefore advocate such protection only as a fairly adjusted revenue tariff will afford.

That we demand a general revision of the present tariff laws that shall give us free salt, iron, lumber, cotton and woolen fabrics, and reduce the whole thing to a revenue basis only.

In 1875—

That we favor a tariff for revenue, so adjusted as to encourage home industry.

In 1877—

That we favor a wisely adjusted tariff for revenue.

That we favor a wisely adjusted tariff for revenue.

In 1879 the very same words occur in the eighth paragraph of the Republican platform. And as late as 1880 the then Republican governor of Iowa put a paragraph in his inaugural message speaking in hostile terms against the prohibitory duty of $28 on steel rails as being a grievous burden on the farmers, by making railroad building more expensive and transportation of their products higher, and asking the Legislature to memorialize Congress to reduce or abolish the duty.

But, Mr. Chairman, soon after this corporate power in Iowa politics became bold, and even insolent, and when it could not control conventions and put such planks in the platform as it desired, it went to the Legislature and accomplished what it had failed to accomplish with delegates at conventions fresh from the country. A great change, however, has taken place within the party within the last two years. The party, enraged by the shameful manner in which it had been misrepresented in a legislative way, arose in its might and displaced the recreant public servants in such decisive numbers that the last Legislature of that State, which has just adjourned, enacted several propositions into law that former Legislatures had refused to listen to. Corporate monopoly power has received hard blows in Iowa within the last two years.

Its executive and legislative departments have been retrieved by the people, and with vigilance on the part of the earnest men of the party more valuable ground will be gained. Pools, trusts, special rates, and other monopolistic contrivances for the prevention of competition and the distribution of favors among the friends of corporate control have been legislatively denounced. And as high protective-tariff interests have everywhere made common cause with the railroads, the telegraphs, and the trusts, and advanced from the old-time doctrine of tariff for revenue, with incidental protection, to protection for the sake of protection, no matter how much money was thereby being taken from the people and hoarded in the Treasury, so this class of tariff pretensions have met the fate of the company they kept and have in Iowa retired to the old ground; and I have not the least doubt but that the wise heads of the party will advise a retreat on this question to the point it occupied before being carried away by the pools and the trusts. And Iowa's representative Republicans have been more outspoken in official life than even their party through its platform.

In July, 1866, the revision of the tariff was before the Congress. Then, as now, the high-tariff men were telling the West they would receive benefits in this way, and that when Hon. John A. Kasson, one of the ablest and most popular men Iowa ever produced, and whom it kept continuously in office until within the last three years, when he voluntarily retired, told the House such propositions were "illogical" and "absurd." "What you call protection," he said, answering the New England sophistries, "amounts, therefore, simply to an equal robbery; taking from one home interest to pay to another." The bill under discussion then was very similar to existing law. Again, in the same speech, speaking of the then pending bill, Mr. Kasson said:

And now what does this bill do? It raises the tariff on lumber, which is so necessary to the Western prairie farmer; on nails, without which he can not drive his boards on his house or build his fence; and on salt, without which he can not preserve his beef and pork. There is hardly a thing we consume which this bill forgets to raise the duty upon. Every prominent necessity of life, food, fuel, shelter, and clothing, is embraced and made more expensive to the consumer throughout the country. Even on boys' pocket-knives the duty is increased about three times, 600 per cent., one member of the committee tells me; and yet it is said this is a tariff for mere protection.

cies Iowa has inherited, from his place in the Senate on January 24, 1867, the question of the tariff being under consideration, spoke as follows:

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, the man who opposes the passage of this bill must expect to be slandered. The "protectionists," as they choose to call themselves, have already opened the vials of their indignant wrath upon the heads of those whose opposition they anticipated. Threats of utter political extinction are hurled against every man who, in the exercise of an independent judgment, is not prepared to impose upon his constituents the burdens which the various manufacturing combinations demand. That portion of the public press suborned to their interest is rife with charges that "the Capital is thronged with free-traders, and that British gold is operating to secure American legislation for British interests." Every man is condemned in advance who would inquire before he would vote.

We know what all this means, and so far as I have the ability, I am resolved that the people shall know what it means.

It means that two or three large manufacturing interests in the country, not satisfied with the enormous profits they have realized during the last six years, are determined at whatever hazard to put more money in their pockets; and to this end they have persuaded some and coerced other manufacturing interests to unite with them in a great combination demand for what they call protection to American labor, but what some others call robbery of the American laborer and agriculturist. * * * It is the fashion to denounce every man who does not favor a prohibitory tariff as a free-trader. The charge is made that free-trade agents are at work to influence Congress, and that our tables are incumbered with free-trade documents. Who has seen these free-trade agents? I have yet to see the first man who was in favor of free trade, nor have I seen any man who was opposed to a revenue tariff which would incidentally protect such branches of American industry as needed the fostering aid of the Government. It is on questions of detail that we differ. We disagree as to now much money shall be taken from the pocket of Peter to support and enrich his brother Paul.

Hon. W. B. ALLISON is an Iowa Republican who has served in Congress since 1864, and was for some years a member of the Ways and Means Committee in this House. He is so strong with his party today in that State that it is presenting him with great earnestness as the proper man to receive the indorsement of his party at large as its candidate for the Presidency. And Senator ALLISON'S strength in Iowa is due to the defense he has made of Iowa interests, and especially with reference to the tariff. On March 24, 1870, in this House, discussing the tariff bill then pending, Senator ALLISON said:

The agricultural interest, it will be seen, is much the largest interest in its aggregate product as well as in the number of persons employed. I believe no one will claim that this large interest is directly protected. It is true that under customs laws there is a small duty upon wheat, barley, oats, and other agricultural products, but it does not afford any protection to the great wheat and grain-producing regions of the country. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Wilson], in discussing this question yesterday stated that the cost of wheat in New England is about $1.70 per bushel, while in Illinois, Iowa, and Wisconsin the price is about 65 cents per bushel. The Canadian wheat is the only wheat that comes in competition with our own. Canada being nearer New England than the wheat-growing States more than makes up the duty in the reduced cost of transportation.

What is true of wheat is equally true of other grains. Therefore the farmer has practically no protection at all, and whatever benefit he derives is from what the home market furnishes for home products. Unfortunately for the farmer, the market price of wheat is fixed by the price which the surplus will bring abroad, or the price of wheat in London or Liverpool. At that market, where the surplus is sold, and which fixes the value of the whole crop, he comes in competition with the grain produced in the Crimea, in Hungary, and in the region of the Baltic, from fields cultivated by what is known, in comparison to our own, as pauper labor.

But I am told we must so legislate as to furnish a home market for all our agricultural products, and this can only be done by high tariff. Any one examining the subject will see that our agricultural products increase more rapidly than our population, so that if we do not export these products in their natural condition we must do so by converting them into manufactured articles, and export these articles. But this can not be done under a high tariff, for all nations will buy manufactured products where they are the cheapest, and the nation selling the cheapest will control the market. This rule excludes our highly-taxed manufactures made from highly-taxed materials from the markets of the world, although we have natural advantages possessed by no other nation.

To the above remarks by Senator ALLISON I invite the attention of the House and country to show the position of the party and the people of his State; and to my colleague from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], who seems to think the farmers of Iowa are sufficiently protected by the tariff on wheat, corn, and other farm products to equalize their benefits under the tariff with the manufacturers in whose special interest it was conceived and enacted, I kindly commend the views of his predecessor, who owes his political eminence to them, with the suggestion that he carefully revise his own sentiments in harmony therewith if he would realize the cherished hope of his friends to still further follow in the way opened up by his illustrious leader.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, it appears from an examination of the record that the weight of the evidence establishes the fact that the true position of the Republican is that of tariff for revenue with such adjustment as will afford incidental protection to our home industries. And this is undoubtedly the correct position.

As a Western man I have no sort of patience with that protection craze which has developed in this country in the form of trusts, having for their object the prevention of competition and fair play; and while the tariff isn ot responsible for all these trusts that are amassing large fortunes on unpaid stocks, the beneficiaries of our tariff laws have abused their trust to such an extent as to put the people who pay the bills on their guard. The history and growth of protection in this country prove this. In the first place, protection was only demanded for our "infant industries." Then, again, it was presented in the shape of a war necessity, to raise the extraordinary sums of money needed to defend the nation's life; and in this connection, in consideration of the heavy tax imposed upon manufactured articles under the internal-revenue system, the duties on imports were largely increased with the distinct pledge and understanding that when the internal-revenue taxes were removed the duties on imports levied to meet them should also be removed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, who reported the bill to increase the duties on imports, stated that the increase was necessary as an "equivalent" to the internal-revenue taxes imposed on manufactured articles. This was in the long session of 1864, and at the close of his speech he made this distinct pledge:

This is intended as a war measure, a temporary measure, and we must give it our support as such.

a war measure imposed by the necessities of the Government, the scarcity of laborers, and the enormous direct taxation.

From this history it appears that it was reserved for the later advocates of protection to put their claim on its own merit as a permanent system. The earlier advocates of protection and all those who spoke for it, up to the day when monopolistic power, through pools and trusts, began to feel that it owned the country, did not pretend that the manufacturers of this country needed legislative aid save in a temporary way, and the country, relying upon the good faith of the statements thus made, acceded to their demands. Protection has run nearly the whole gamut of subterfuges, pleading, among other things, its own infancy and its country's misfortunes as the different reasons why the people should give it aid, promising solemnly in each instance that when the reason for the tax had ceased the tax itself should cease. But the friends of this special interest are fertile in resources, and now, when infancy has passed, when the misfortunes of war are over and the taxes on manufactured products are removed and the people come to claim their own according to the bond, they are met with another subterfuge.

Recognizing a need of an apparent growth in grace, the alleged friends of protection are massing their forces on high moral grounds, and are now demanding that before the tax is removed from the poor man's necesssities the tax must be taken from whisky and tobacco, but more especially from whisky. This is the last resort, and I trust it is doomed to meet the ignominious defeat it deserves. But why on any pretext longer dally on this subject? What promise has been kept? What promise has been made by the advocates of these high duties that they have not violated? Not only so, but in many instances we find the beneficiaries of this aid combining to regulate and forestall the market value of their own products and cheat the country out of the benefits of the promised competition among themselves after the country generously conceded them the protection asked from foreign competition.

With this kind of record before the country, can protectionists complain if some people should suspect protection capable of making common cause with the monopolistic interest of the country, and that the miraculous conversions to their cause that they parade as the result of honest research and enlightened understanding, are simply the effects of a prudent and well-disposed extension of the metallic influences of a most lucrative system. If protection has not been recreant to an indulgent people, it has been peculiarly unfortunate in the record it has made, and can not blame the people, and especially the farmers of the West, whose interest in any view of the case are most remote and most doubtful, for wanting a showing of assets and a general accounting of stock.

For these reasons the people of the West turn instinctively to a modification of the tariff for a reduction of the revenues to a point commensurate with the needs of the Government.

The pending measure does not meet my views, as I am opposed to any reduction of internal taxes, and would prefer a greater reduction of duty on sugar if not indeed its entire removal. But modification being one of the demands of the hour, differences as to details must give way to compromise if anything is to be accomplished and the country assured that its Representatives are not again violating faith and reaching the same end by another road that it reached in the previous House. My objection to the bill is that it does not sufficiently reduce the tariff duties and reduces internal-revenue taxes too much.

But I can not have my way, and as the bill leaves the duty at a higher average per cent. than former tariffs enacted by the special champions of protection, and is higher than is needed to cover any difference there may be between the price of labor in this country and foreign countries, and conflicts to as limited an extent with any special interests in my State, and especially the district I have the honor to represent, as any that is ever likely to meet the approval of a majority of this House, I am prepared to support the measure with some few modifications. And it is impossible for me to see what reasonable excuse a Western Representative can frame for his defense in voting against the bill in all cases where it does not encroach upon some special interest in the district in which the member may chance to live.

OTHER TARIFFS TO MODIFY.

But, Mr. Chairman, there are other tariffs that need revising and reducing as well as the tariff on imports, and the leading one is the tariff the railways are imposing upon the domestic commerce of the country. And as these tariffs hunt in couples and constitute the component parts of a trap that catches the commerce of the country, foreign or domestic, whether it be going or coming, it is altogether pertinent to this discussion to submit in this connection a few suggestions as to the imperfection of any tariff reform that does not radically reform the railway tariffs of the country. And this matter is of special interest to my section of the country, so far inland and from the leading markets, whether at home or abroad. Our farmers pay the extortionate rate of the railroad tariff going to market with their products, and they pay the manufacturer's tariff and the railroad tariff coming home with the necessaries of life.

Our railroad establishment is a great blessing, yet dominating as it has, and still does, all other interests in this country, building up this point and crushing that, enriching one man and impoverishing another, corrupting with its vicious methods the entire business of the country, extorting hundreds of millions from the people each year in excess of reasonable charges for the services rendered, and corrupting the various departments of government, State and national, until the entire country seems helpless in the railway barons' grasp, it would be better that this country had struggled on with its old-fashioned methods of transportation if these great evils can not be arrested and forever prohibited.

The railroad companies, like the manufacturers of the country, have abused the generosity of the people who contributed of subsidy, both public and private, a large proportion of the capital which built the roads. And when, after the roads are built, equipped, and in running order, the people look over the account and find that these roads, notwithstanding the generous gifts of individuals, towns, cities, counties, States, and the United States—these highways are charged up to the country for transportation purposes at about three times what they are worth, and when they suggest some plan of adjustment or management that will have a tendency to equalize the burdens between the companies and the people they are set down as an unreasoning, raw mob who are simply dissatisfied on account of the great distance they see between themselves and gentlemen who are able to be connected with the railway establishment of the country. And those who have been in authority have been so dead as to the trespasses and sins of this great establishment that but little progress has been made in the way of correcting the great abuses connected with it.

Built, as I have said, largely by public and private subsidy, this establishment is charged up to the country at an enormous cost, which, with the tremendous power it has in commanding the highways, makes the contest between it and other industries a most unequal one.

These various lines, according to Poor's Manual, had in operation in 1886 125,146 miles of road charged up to the country in capital stock, and debt at more than $8,000,000,000, with earnings to the amount of about $800,000,000, whilst for the year 1887, Mr. Poor says, at page 10 of his Manual for 1887, that—

> The earnings for 1887 are likely to equal $900,000,000, the increase to equal fully 10 per cent. over that of 1886.

And from the same authority we learn that the roads earned $305 per mile more in 1886 than they did in 1885, and he adds that—

> Hereafter it seems probable that the earnings of our railroads are to increase in ratio considerably greater than the amount of capital invested in them.

And for the benefit of those who are endeavoring to make the people think the interstate-commerce law of last year is a thing of virtue, I call attention to Mr. Poor's observation that—

> The general managers of our great lines feel themselves to be much more masters of the situation, as it were, than for some years past.

And this is perfectly natural, as I shall endeavor to show before I finish. This railroad establishment is the most costly one in existence on the earth, and unless put under stringent legal control will make itself such complete "masters" of the entire country that the people will practically be transferred from a republic to an amalgamated corporation. The entire obligations of this Government for the ensuing year are estimated at $326,000,000, and yet the railroads taxed the people of this country, according to Mr. Poor, for the year 1887, $900,000,000, or nearly three times as much as the United States charged the people to run the machinery and discharge the obligations of the Government.

These railroads have a funded debt that is as much a debt and charge on the people as the debt of the United States, and that debt is this year about the enormous sum of $4,000,000,000 or $1,300,000,000 larger than the debt of the United States at the close of the war, and on this debt the companies are making the people pay a greater interest than they are paying on the Government debt. And the whole stands for fraud and ought to be wiped out of existence. When a farmer puts a mortgage on his farm it goes on as an incumbrance, and he is hard pressed till it is removed; whereas a railroad company may be characterized as a creature organized for the express opportunity of going into debt, and the peculiarity is that the more the company becomes indebted the richer becomes its proprietor, for it has methods which enable it to fix its value at any arbitrary sum it pleases and levy contributions on the people of the surrounding country to make that valuation sound and reliable. Peter A. Dey, a railroad commissioner of Iowa, first chief engineer of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and a thoroughly competent man in his profession, testified before the Pattison Pacific Railroad Commission last year that the Union Pacific road could be replaced, equipped, for $25,000 per mile, and I doubt not that the entire system in the United States could be replaced at that figure, or perhaps less, which would put their value at about $3,000,000,000.

If this be true these railroads are costing the country this year in excess of a reasonable charge for their services as common carriers about the sum of $600,000,000, which, in connection with the $550,000,000 it is estimated the people pay on account of tariff duties, is the snug sum of $1,150,000,000, which annual drain from the people accounts for the fabulous fortunes so suddenly made by the railroad and trust barons of the country. The prices of all property, save railroad and trust property, fluctuate and vary being affected by the surroundings; but the stocks and bonds of railroads, let the property cost what it may, been ever so extravagantly built, and when prices of labor and materials were high, let these all vary, and come and go in price as they may with good and hard times, railroad stocks and bonds, the alleged cost of the roads, stand as steady as the earth that is checkered with their mileage. The people saw this great wrong, and they asked that they have such legislation as would right it. They demanded that the pool by which the companies fixed arbitrarily the charges for transportation, thereby fixing arbitrarily the value of railroad property, be prohibited, and that the companies be denied the power of favoritism called special rates by which they have been able to transform old-fashioned bribery into a "common courtesy."

The people made demand that pools and special rates, the twin abominations by which the railroads have placed every other industry in this country at their feet, should be taken out of the hands of the companies as power too dangerous to trust in the hands of anybody. With competition restored, favoritism abolished, rates would seek their level like other property, and the equilibrium be restored. The companies saw the rage of the people; and, taking time by the forelock, they find themselves intrenched behind a commission, the dumping ground of legislative responsibility, and the result is that rates are increased, the roads are made to earn $305 per mile more than before the law was enacted, and in the language of Mr. Poor, an authority on that subject, "The managers of our great lines feel themselves to be much more masters of the situation, as it were, than for some years past." The "managers" feel that they have something that their friends can keep the country quiet with, until they see how the "experiment" works, and the companies know that by that time they will be the better enthroned and established through judicial and legal barricade in the possession of their ill-gotten gains and fictitious values.

These companies know that any public and governmental recognition they can have from their present standpoint of fraudulent stocks and bonds and values in general is in the direction of giving them character and stability. Hence they regard the interstate-commerce law, with a commission provided for that treats with them as an honorable establishment on an honest and sound basis, as a step in the direction of a general curative statute, and "they feel more like masters of the situation than they have for years." And when the first act of the commission was to suspend the law pending investigation, instead of after investigation, it looked as though the companies had made no mistake.

And when, on reading the first annual report of that august tribunal instituted to execute a law to prevent and break up certain practices on the part of the railroad companies of the country, we find that it simply offers an apology on behalf of the companies to show why they are not complying with the most important provisions of the law, the people of this country will be the more confirmed in the opinion that the railroad managers knew what they were doing, and that the people in asking for bread received a stone.

I have given this matter attention, and I do not believe there is substantial compliance with the law, or ever will be until the discretionary power exercised by the companies by virtue of the words "undue" and "unreasonable" and "like circumstance and condition" is taken root and branch out of their hands, their schedules of rates required to be posted where men can see them instead of filed away in drawers in the office of the Interstate Commerce Commission, where it takes three days to find them after you get to the office, and State courts given jurisdiction for the enforcement of rights under the law, instead of practically denying parties aggrieved a day in court by sending them to United States courts or the United States commission. And to show that in the matter of rates the companies are ignoring both the law and the commission and furnishing grounds for the next annual apology on the part of the commission, I submit the following extracts from schedules of rates in the office of the commission as they were prepared for me by Mr. C. C. McCain, the competent and courteous auditor of that body:

Respectfully, yours,

C. C. McCAIN, Auditor.

These tables show that the rate from Council Bluffs and Kansas City, about 500 miles, is as great as the rate from Chicago to New York, about 1,000 miles; and that the rate from Bedford, Iowa, to Chicago is as great as the rate from Kansas City over the same line in the same direction to the same destination, though the distance from Kansas City to Chicago is about 150 miles greater than from Bedford. And the distance from Sidney, Iowa, to Chicago is 50 miles less than from Council Bluffs, and from Creston, Iowa, is 100 miles less, and yet the rate is substantially the same.

Mr. Chairman, the reduction of the railroad establishment in this country to an equality with other industries is the first business of the hour. As the system stands at present it commands everybody and everything by the tremendous power it exercises over the highways, that power being as recklessly and as wantonly exercised as it ever was by the gentlemanly highwaymen of the olden time. And as it stands at present the people are as helpless in the grasp of railroad managers, who are "masters of the situation" in fact, and have as little to say as to how the $900,000,000 is to be collected off them for transportation this year as he who at the muzzle of the highwayman's gun quietly gave up his purse. And those managers are not content with extorting from the people more than half a million money directly as common carriers, but they organize commercial companies along the line of their roads, and through the preference the managers of the roads can give those companies as special rates enable them to drive into bankruptcy and out of business all competition. The Standard Oil trust, that has absrobed hundreds of millions of the people's money, could not have been a thing possible but for the unlawful and vicious contracts it had with transportation lines.

And along the line of all these roads, and notably along the line of the Union Pacific Railway, commercial companies are organized whose owners control the transportation lines they are situated on, and through special rates granted them are enabled to bankrupt and drive out of business all competition, so that the people are left utterly helpless in the hands of the railroad managers not only as to the price of transportation but as to the price of all that is transported. Under these circumstances it is not at all strange that farm lands and farm products should be steadily declining all the time, and that railroad property, and the stocks of any trust with arrangements for special rates from a railway company, should be steadily appreciating in value and scarcely obtainable in the open markets. These great wrongs must be crushed out of existence. If the laws were as they should be in this country, and those laws were decently enforced, the proprietors of such conspiracies for forestalling the market value of products and to prevent the due course of trade and commerce would be convicted of felonies and sent to prison, where they would properly belong.

The great West is suffering more to-day from the abuse in railway tariffs than from the abuse in high impost duties. But she is suffering from both, and she joins hands cordially with the tariff reformers in the reduction of duties, and she asks them to join hands with her in her effort to reduce the charges of railroad transportation, which at the present time are at least 50 per cent. higher than honesty and good conscience demand.

The great West, the granary of the world, is charged so much for transportation that all her profits are absorbed in going to market, and the cheap products of the outside world come to her with high tariff duties and high freight rates added, so that between the upper and the nether mill-stones of tariff for revenue and tariff for railroads the great West is dispoiled of her substance, and seems to be left the common prey of the manufacturers and common carriers of the country.

This condition of things will not much longer be tolerated by a brave and self-respecting people. Unrest is manifest everywhere. Labor unions, farmers' alliances, and numerous other organizations are forming, and while there is more or less lack of harmony, light is breaking and the day is not far distant when all these men, with common cause and common interest, will unite to overthrow the commercial monsters that are coining their sweat. And when they do who can doubt the result? Then will come legislation for men as well as commerce. And this legislation will be for the men who in time of peace create the nation's wealth and in time of war defend it with their lives.

The great contest in this country that we are now entering upon is one for the equality of commercial and industrial establishments before the law, as men are equal before the law. The people are awakening to the fact that after having contended in this country for more than a hundred years, in war and in peace, for the equality of all men before the law they are in danger of losing the fruits of their costly triumphs through a species of class legislation in the interest of certain industries.

The people can not cope with these Government-aided interests, whose agents, procurers, slanderers, and bribe-distributers throng the halls of all legislation in this country; and when they come to understand that this is the source of the inequalities that exist and the prolific source of all the extortionate burdens they bear they will unite their straggling forces, and with the same invincible power with which they slew the monster of human slavery at the South they will slay this more modern monster that is seeking to enslave all men who eat their bread in the sweat of their face, and again place the Government in the hands of the whole people, where it rightfully belongs.

The following colloquy took place during the foregoing speech:

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Will my friend permit a question?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. My friend will observe that the protective system regulates competition between our own country and other countries, to make it fair, just, and humane, while combines and trusts destroy all competition. That is the difference.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. I think the gentleman will find his question answered fully and emphatically in the course of my remarks.

Mr. CHEADLE. Mr. Chairman, the presence of a large surplus in the national Treasury has inspired the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber to deliberately attack the industrial system inaugurated by the Republican party in 1861; a system which has brought marvelous prosperity and industrial development to the whole country; a system which in twenty-two years time, since the close of the war, has brought into the Treasury enough money to defray the current expenses of Government, bring its depreciated paper money up to par with gold and silver, and enable the Government to refund the war debt at a much lower rate of interest, pay off seventeen hundred millions of dollars of the principal of the war debt, and collect into the Treasury the present surplus—a system that has attracted and now commands the admiration of the ablest political economists and wisest statesmen in the world.

A system that has produced such results must possess intrinsic merit, must be based upon wise, conservative, sound, economic principles, and before we, the representatives of the nation that has under its prospering provisions achieved so many industrial victories and such marvelous increase of wealth, consent to set it aside and make a change, it will be the part of wisdom to know that the new system, the one proposed for adoption, will be able to afford wiser safeguards to American industrial development.

PROTECTION THE CENTRAL IDEA.

The central idea of the present system is the levying of duties on importations from foreign governments in conformity to a rule that will, while it brings into the national Treasury the required sum of money necessary to meet the demands of the Government, so arrange the levy that American goods, wares, and merchandise shall be protected from free and unrestricted competition with those of foreign governments.

Mr. Chairman, this principle that has been tested for a period of twenty-seven years under the greatest possible variety of conditions; tested in time of war and in time of peace; tested with a depreciated paper currency and with a circulating medium redeemable in coin and equal to it in purchasing value; a principle that has proven by that fairest, safest, and best of all tests, experience, to be equal to any and all demands that can be made upon it, to be set aside, and for what reason? Because, notwithstanding it has accomplished all, yes, much more than its most sanguine advocates ever claimed it would, it has come to be considered by that modern Pericles of Democracy, President Cleveland, to be the "vicious, illogical, and iniquitous source of unnecessary taxation."

The wise men of ancient and modern times have laid down this axiom—that there is no rule of guidance in human affairs so safe, none that can be so implicitly relied upon, as that of experience. This fact must hold good for special reasons in the consideration of all industrial questions.

Happily for all who may wish to contrast conditions and results under different industrial policies in the history of our Government, the past "rises before us like a dream," and we can see and know what results have been produced under tariff laws enacted and enforced in the interest of protection, and the results when the tariff laws have been enacted and enforced with the sole purpose in view of raising revenue to defray the expense of Government.

The lines of light and darkness are not more distinctly drawn in nature than are those of prosperity and prostration of business under these different industrial systems. I shall not go into a statistical statement to prove the facts stated in support of my views, but will say, quoting from the history of the past, that every one, not one, or two, or three, but every period of industrial development from the organization of the Government in 1789, to this good hour, every one of them, and all of them, were preceded by the adoption of a tariff so adjusted and levied as to afford protection to American goods, wares, and merchandise from open and unrestricted competition with foreign importations. This is the history of the past, and I group these eras after the second war with England as follows, from 1825 to 1833, from 1842 to 1846, and from 1861 to 1888.

I do not stop here. I am willing to go further, to accept other burdens, and to assert, and challenge successful contradiction of the truth of the statement I now make, that every single period of industrial and business depression and every financial disaster, with one single exception, and that phenomenal and growing out of the war, was preceded by a change in the manner of levying duties, whereby the feature of protection to American goods, wares, and merchandise was stricken out and tariff duties were levied for the sole purpose of providing revenue for the support of the General Government. I group these periods of industrial and business depression and financial disaster as follows: From 1817 to 1825, from 1833 to 1841, and from 1847 to 1861. There they are, gentlemen, recorded and of history, and it is from a careful study of these facts that we must reach a conclusion in reference to our duty in considering the pending bill.

Henry Clay, a leader of industrial thought, left it as his deliberate judgment that the period of most sweeping and universal depression in all our commercial and industrial interests was from 1817 to 1825. By the terms of the treaty of Ghent, at the close of the war of 1812 between America and England, and at the request of the progenitors of the present Cobden Club, all the protective features of our tariff laws were removed, and duties were levied for the purpose of raising revenue only. Mr. Clay also declared that the eight years from 1825 to 1833 were the most prosperous in our history. What wand of progress touched our prostrate and perishing industries in 1825 and awakened them into not only a newness of life but to such marvelous development?

Mr. Chairman, I say to you, to the committee, and especially to my colleagues from the South, that if history and experience establish any one fact more clearly than any other, it is that it was the protective tariff of 1824, increased and amplified by the act of 1828. The people had been for eight years staggering under the revenue tariff of 1816; our industries were practically destroyed; labor was unemployed, except in agriculture, and want was an unbidden guest everywhere, when, in 1824, the protective features were restored to our tariff laws, and at once, and as if by magic, these industries awakened to a newness of life, and in less than eight years the whole current of events was changed. Labor was everywhere in demand at remunerative prices, and prosperity, such as our nation had not up to that time known, blessed all our people, blessed them through the diversification of labor industries and the consequent increased demand for labor. One would think that such an illustration would have caused the statesmen of that day to have permitted plenty to bless the land.

Mr. Chairman, history is ever repeating itself. The leaders of the section of the Union who are now demanding the repeal of the protective tariff of 1861 then demanded the repeal of the tariff of 1824 and 1828, and they succeeded, and the revenue tariff of 1832 was enacted and went into operation in 1833 and continued in force until 1842. Did it give the farmers, mechanics, and laborers relief? Did it bring prosperity to the country and plenty to the homes of those who toil? The history of that decade is one of widespread disaster. Loss to the capitalist. Loss to the business man. Loss to the farmers. Loss to the mechanic and artisan. The blight of industrial prostration rested like a cloud over all the country, until all the varied business and commercial interests were covered with it as the waters cover the deep. It is not strange that it was so.

Labor is king, the mightiest king that ever ruled the earth. Labor, when employed, is a powerful force, felt in every avenue of trade and business. Give labor employment at remunerative wages and nothing can impede the onward march of its progress. It lays its hands upon a wilderness, and it becomes a garden of roses and flowers. It wants the continent bound by bands of steel, and lo! a railroad reaches from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Every mile of these railroads opens up new industries, new markets, and thus the boundary of labor's possibilities widens on every hand. This is a law as inexorable as those of fate, and as true as Holy Writ; and yet, because it always has been and now is, an existing condition at variance with certain platitudes of theories considered by certain theorists to be true, they will not accept them, deny their existence, and though again and again demonstrated, persist in flying in the face of history and ofttimes repeated precedents, by insisting that if it be true that a revenue tariff did produce these results from 1833 to 1842, they could theoretically demonstrate the fact that a tariff for revenue only would not produce them from and after January, 1847, when the Walker tariff was to go into effect.

I pause long enough to remark that it did, however. Strange as it may appear to my colleagues, who clamor for a revenue tariff or a tariff for revenue only, it did work out the same identical results. In a time of profound peace, when the wants of the Government were merely nominal, and during a decade when there was taken from the mines of California and added to the circulating medium of the people the enormous sum of one thousand millions of gold, a sum sufficient in itself to awaken into life the energies of a continent; in a decade in which there were no epidemics, at a time when pestilence did not oppress, at a time when rain and sunshine brought forth abundant harvest to bless the farmer, what was our condition ten full years after the law of 1847 went into effect? Were our great labor industries busy? Was labor everywhere employed at fair wages? Did peace and prosperity bless our people? Were the receipts of the Government equal to or in excess of its current expenditures? Were the shelves of our merchants filled with the products of our looms and spindles? Did the Treasury report show a surplus? As an historical fact was the condition of the people and of the Treasury such that we can now point with pride to that period?

Mr. Chairman, this is a Democratic House that leans strongly towards free trade; a House whose Speaker is and has been since 1883 a member of the English free-trade Cobden Club; a Speaker who, in naming the Committee on Ways and Means, did not place on the majority a representative of any of these great labor industries from any one of the great manufacturing States of the Government, nor did he name the committee so that its control would be in the hands of men who have in the past and do now believe in the dignity of labor; but he did name the Committee on Ways and Means in such a way that the control of the majority was left in the hands of men who have been and now are not only opposed to protection and in favor of free trade, but were so deeply impressed with the idea that capital should own its own labor, that they had the courage to risk life itself in an effort to create a confederacy the corner-stone of which should be human slavery.

While I am a Republican protectionist, therefore, Mr. Chairman, in order that my reply may be shorn of all personality, I shall call upon a prominent and honored Democratic official to bear testimony in my behalf, a name the mere mention of which must command the respect and confidence of my colleagues upon the other side of the Chamber. A man ripe in years and in experience; a man who from childhood to a ripe old age had studied all the phases of this industrial problem and brought to his aid in reaching his conclusions all the experience of the past industrial history of the Government, and his evidence is not merely a casual remark; it is his judgment upon existing facts known to him and carefully set forth in his first annual message to Congress, delivered December 8, 1857. My witness is none other than ex-President James Buchanan, who, in speaking of the conditions—not theories—then existing in all branches of our industrial and commercial circles, said:

> We have possessed all the elements of material wealth in rich abundance, and yet, notwithstanding all these advantages, our country, in its monetary interests, is at the present moment in a deplorable condition. In the midst of unsurpassed plenty in all the productions of agriculture and in all the elements of national wealth, we find our manufactures suspended, our public works retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers thrown out of employment and reduced to want. The revenue of the Government, which is chiefly derived from duties on imports from abroad, has been greatly reduced. Under these circumstances a loan may be required before the close of your present session, but this, although deeply to be regretted, would prove to be only a slight misfortune when compared with the suffering and distress prevailing among the people.

Mr. Chairman, I appeal from the statement of President Cleveland, who says the present protective tariff is the "vicious, iniquitous, and illogical source of unnecessary taxation," and who makes an appeal for a revenue tariff, to the experienced statesman and learned Democratic President, James Buchanan, who, in his annual message to Congress in December, 1857, laid before Congress and the country the existing conditions, not theories, of the national Treasury, the business and industrial conditions existing at the end of an uninterrupted decade of the same tariff reform, ten years of the same tariff policy that President Cleveland and the gentlemen of the South now ask us to adopt.

I ask if in the light of this Democratic official evidence, if in the light of history and in the face of these ascertained and established facts, it will be wise for Congress, with an outstanding national war debt of $1,200,000,000 and unadjudicated debts running into the hundreds of millions, which must be paid within the next five years, to set aside an industrial policy which has been found to be equal to every emergency, in war and in peace; a policy which has quadrupled our wealth in twenty-eight years and enabled the people to pay the heavy tax burdens laid upon them and pay off seventeen hundred millions of the principal of the war debt; a policy that has built up an industrial system so diversified that it has been able to meet all the demands of our people in all their wants—I repeat, in the light of experience and history, can we afford to set aside the present policy and enter upon another and different one, one that has been often tried, and one that has just as often as it has been tried inevitably resulted in business depression, industrial paralysis, driven labor out of employment and into enforced idleness, depleted the national Treasury and left it in bankruptcy; and the national credit seriously impaired?

I take it, Mr. Chairman, that no one fact is more clearly established than this, that the inevitable result of every change in our tariff laws, from protection to a revenue tariff—or a tariff for revenue only—or in the case of every material reduction in the tariff that the trade balance has been largely increased against our Government.

The average rate of tariff in 1832 was 37.6 per cent. The same in 1833. In 1834 it was reduced to 18 per cent. The average trade balance against our Government during these three years was $11,156,618. Then the reduced tariff of 1833 went into full effect and the average for the next three years ran down to 18, 16, and 14.5 per cent., and the average annual trade balance increased to $30,939,540. The great financial revulsion of 1837 began in May of the latter year, and resulted in universal loss to every industry and business, while labor was everywhere in enforced idleness.

Take another financial revulsion, that of 1857. The average per cent. of the tariff for the years 1854, 1855, and 1856 was 22.7. During these years the average annual imports amounted to $267,764,352; the exports to $224,391,807, leaving a balance of trade against us of $43,372,545 a year. Then the average tariff levy was reduced to 15.6 per cent., with this marvelous result: in six months our imports ran up to $183,733,038; our exports decreased to the sum of $105,420,659, leaving a trade balance against us in half a year of $78,312,379, or a balance against us of more than $156,000,000 a year; and in less than six months after the reduction took place the great financial revulsion of 1857 began, a crisis that wrought havoc and widespread disaster all over the land.

What is a balance of trade against our Government? It is the difference between what we sell abroad and what we buy from abroad, and must be paid in gold or its equivalent, and yet notwithstanding the fact that the past history of our financial and business disasters shows conclusively the cause for each and all of them to be a radical change in our tariff laws, or a material reduction, yet we are gravely asked to-day to embark once more on the treacherous course, where we know that dangers and breakers will menace us on every hand. For one, Mr. Chairman, I shall enter my protest against such a suicidal policy, because experience, the best of all guides, tells me the result will be disastrous to the whole country, and more especially so to the labor and labor-industries. I think, Mr. Chairman, that it is our first, our highest, our imperative duty, to enact laws for the protection of the material interests of the people we represent. I do not believe that we can be justified, in the light of history and experience, in adopting a policy that has in every instance when it has been tested resulted in such dire results to the industrial and financial interests of the people.

PROTECTION DOES PROTECT LABOR.

Mr. Chairman, I have heard gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber declare that protection does not protect the laborer here in America. I am not a theorist, and yet if the great industrial system of protection to American labor does not protect it I have wondered why it was that hundreds of thousands of men and women left their homes in Europe every year and emigrated to America to become citizens of the Republic and co-workers in its manifest destiny. Sir, do you believe that all these thousands come here to be made slaves? Would they flee from the oppressions of Europe to become still more oppressed here by an industrial system that is talked about, studied, and prayed for in every humble cottage in Sweden, Germany, Ireland, wherever there is a resolute heart that yearns for larger liberty, better wages, and a greater margin of profit from daily toil?

Mr. Chairman, protection does protect labor, and I am going, in a practical way, to demonstrate just how it does it in one or two lines of trade. First, I want to illustrate, by two actual purchases of clothing, one made in London, England, the other here in Washington City, and show just how the American tailor is protected in the question of wages paid him in comparison with the wages paid the tailor in London. I desire to state the amount paid in London for a suit of clothes and the amount paid for an overcoat; then the price paid the tailor in London for making the suit of clothes and the price paid him for making the overcoat. I desire then to shew the amount the dealer retained to pay for the material used, for cutting the garments, and profit on his business in London, and having done this to institute a comparison between them and the amounts paid and received here in Washington for the same purposes.

I may be permitted to remark, Mr. Chairman, that these facts and figures, obtained from actual purchases, not from any theorist, demonstrate conclusively the truth of the declaration I now make, that protection does protect the American laborer who is a tailor and works on woolen clothing. My townsman, Dr. J. M. C. Adams, of Frankfort, Ind., was in London, England, last fall, and while there had an overcoat and suit of clothes made to order. He paid the merchant tailor in our money $20 for the suit of clothes and $20 for the overcoat. He asked the gentleman what he had to pay his journeyman tailor for making the suit of clothes, and he was astonished, as I have no doubt you, Mr. Chairman, the committee, and the country will be when told that the tailor who made the suit of clothes was paid the magnificent sum of $3.50. Three dollars and fifty cents paid in the great city of London—home of the Cobden Club—for making a suit of heavy winter clothes!

Upon further inquiry he was informed that the journeyman tailor who made the overcoat was also paid the magnificent sum of $3 for making a heavy beaver cloth overcoat. Let us for the purpose of easy comparison and illustration take $1,000 worth of merchant tailoring in London and compare it with the same amount of work here in Washington. Let us see how much of the $1,000 is paid in London to the men who make the clothes, and how much is retained by the dealer to pay for material used, for cutting garments, and as profits on his business; and having done that then ascertain the same facts here in Washington City, and having done this institute a comparison between them.

COST OF LONDON CLOTHING:

25 suits of clothing at $20 each	$500.00
25 overcoats at $20 each	500.00
Total value of London clothing	1,000.00

MONEY PAID TAILORS TO MAKE LONDON CLOTHING.

Paid journeyman tailors for making 25 suits of clothes at $3.50 each	$87.50
Paid journeyman tailors for making 25 overcoats at $3 each	75.00
Total amount paid for making $1,000 worth of clothing in London	162.50

Deduct from the $1,000 the amount paid for making the clothing, $162.50, and we find that out of the sum the merchant tailor had left $837.50 to pay for material, cutting, and profits. Thus we find that out of $1,000 worth of clothing made the men who made the clothes received only $162.50; the merchant $837.50; or, put in another form, labor was paid 16.25 per cent. the dealer received 83.75 per cent. out of each dollar's worth of clothing sold. I bought a suit of clothes here in the city and an overcoat, and from my tailor I learned what he paid his jours for making the suit and for making the overcoat. I paid him for a spring overcoat $28 and he paid his journeyman tailor $10 for making it. If it had been a heavy winter overcoat, like my townsman bought in London, then he would have paid his journeyman $12 for making it. I paid him for the suit of clothes $38 and he paid his journeyman tailors $16 for making the suit.

Let us take $1,000 worth of merchant tailoring here, or as nearly as we can, and ascertain what amount is paid for making the clothes and how much is retained by the merchant to pay for material used, for cutting the garments, and profit on the business.

COST OF WASHINGTON CLOTHING.

Sixteen overcoats at $28 each	$448
Fifteen suits of clothes at $38 each	570
Total value of Washington clothing	1,018

MONEY PAID WASHINGTON TAILORS.

Paid journeyman tailors for making sixteen overcoats at $10 each	$160
Paid journeyman tailors for making fifteen suits of clothes at $16 each	240
Total amount paid for making $1,018 worth Washington clothing	400

Deduct from the $1,018 worth of Washington merchant-tailor work the sum of $400 paid Washington jour tailors for making the clothing, and we find that the merchant has left to pay for material used in the clothes, for cutting them, and profit on his business, the sum of $618; while the merchant tailor in London has, out of the same amount, left him for the same purposes the larger sum of $837.50. Thus out of $1,018 worth of clothing made here in Washington, the tailors who make the clothes are paid the sum of $400, while the merchant receives $618; or, if you please, stated in another form, labor was paid 40 per cent.; the merchant received 60 per cent. out of each dollar's worth of clothing made and sold here in America, where, according to the arguments, declarations, and conclusions of the members of the South, labor is oppressed and impoverished by the "vicious, illogical, and iniquitous policy of protection."

These facts, which are true, facts obtained from actual sales and purchases, show that here in America the tailors who make the thousand dollars' worth of clothing receive $400 for their labor, while in London they receive only $162.50. Four hundred dollars paid to tailors here in protected America for making $1,000 worth of clothing versus $162.50 paid for making the same amount of clothing in free-trade London tells the story of how protection protects American tailors in more convincing language than any argument I can offer, or than any words I can possibly utter. Mr. Chairman, like an axiom in mathematics, it demonstrates itself.

I make two points on the facts I have given, and I challenge contradiction of either one of them. They cannot be successfully denied. They can not be disputed. They will stand as mile-stones to mark the progress we have made in industrial development. They tell how, under the wise, practical, and beneficent system of protection, we have so diversified labor industries that the price paid for labor here is two and one half times greater than the price paid for similar work in London, England.

First. I make the point that labor here in protected America is paid 40 per cent., while in London, England, labor is paid only 16¼ per cent. of the cost of clothing for making the clothes.

Second. I show that while the merchant tailor in London received 83¾ per cent. of the value of the clothing he made and sold, the same person here in protected America received only 60 per cent. for the material furnished, for cutting the goods, and profit on his business.

These figures and illustrations are conclusive, and prove that labor is equally as well protected under our system of taxation as the manufacturer. Does any man pretend to think or believe, that the protected American tailor who is paid $16 here in Washington City for making a suit of clothes can not buy more of the necessaries of life here, can not live better here, can not save more money here, is not better off here, than the English tailor in London is, or can ever hope to be, who is paid and receives only $3.50 for doing the same work in that great metropolis of free trade?

Sixteen dollars paid here in the capital of protected America for making a suit of clothes versus $3.50 paid in free-trade London! Gentlemen of the South, advocates of the proposed Mills bill, a measure which should be entitled "An act to paralyze American industries and pauperize American labor for the sole benefit of foreign manufacturers, and laborers, and American importers, whose only interest in America is the rent they pay," how do you like this photograph from real life? How can these facts, and figures, and conclusions be evaded? Will any advocate of the bill under consideration stand up here, in the presence of this committee and of the country, and even pretend to say that the tailor who made my overcoat here in Washington, and was paid $10 for the work, does not live on that sum infinitely better than the tailor in London ever can hope to live who was paid $3 for making an overcoat there?

Ten dollars for making an overcoat here in protected America versus $3 for making the same article in free-trade London carries with the statement its own conclusive answer to all the arguments that can be formulated against it, and shows in a way so plain and simple and conclusive that even a child can see and know and comprehend, and at the same time so convincing and irresistible that human sophistry can not impair the force of the truth in the declaration that protection does protect the wages of American laborers.

AMERICAN LABORERS HAVE A SHARE OF THE WEALTH WROUGHT BY THEIR HANDS.

My distinguished colleague, Mr. BYNUM, said the other day in his able tariff speech:

> The advocates of protection tell us that the country has grown rich under this system. True, it has grown rich, but where is the wealth? In the hands of the few, while poverty abides in the homes of the many. Why is it that the great masses of the people have no share in the wealth that has been wrought by their hands?

My reply to this statement is that the only true measure of prosperity is the balance the laborer has left after he has provided the necessaries of life for himself and those dependent upon him; and it is by a comparison of this balance under different conditions that we can arrive at an intelligent and correct conclusion of the queries, whether the money made is in the hands of the few, and whether labor has a share of the wealth it produces here in protected America. My colleague boasts that he represents thousands of intelligent wage-workers and manufacturers of fifty millions of annual products. I admit that fact, and then I challenge him to show a community where there are an equal number of wage-workers, a city whose manufacturers produce fifty millions a year, beyond the limits of the United States, anywhere on the face of the earth, where the wage-workers own as many homes and have as much money to their credit in the banks, the savings of their labor. I tell the gentleman and the committee no man can find such a place anywhere.

I do not stop here. There are in Europe 312,000,000 people, and in the industrial North not far from 40,000,000 of people, or one-eighth the number in Europe; and yet the laborers of the North, the men who, in the opinion of my distinguished colleague, are oppressed by protection, have to-day on deposit in their savings-banks a sum equal to the savings of the wagemen of the 312,000,000 people of Europe and in addition thereto a surplus of more than $200,000,000 to spare. Mr. Chairman, this sum, vast as it is, is not taken into consideration and does not represent a dollar's value in the millions of homes owned by the laborers of the busy industrial North. No other country on earth presents such a magnificent spectacle. No other policy than protection could enable the bread-winners in millions of instances to own their homes and in addition thereto have placed to their credit in their savings banks more than one thousand millions of dollars.

My distinguished colleague also said: "American labor to-day is carrying upon its back burdens which the labor of no other country could stand." And why, Mr. Chairman? Why can not the labor of any other country stand the burden of taxation? I will tell my colleague why. It is because they are not so well paid as American labor; not so well housed as American labor; not so well clothed as American labor; not so well fed as American labor; do not have so large a balance left after paying for the necessaries of life as American labor has; and that is why they can not bear such a burden. In the great industrial North the children of our wage-workers are sent to school from six to nine months in the year; and the nearer the schools are located to one of these manufacturing centers the longer the term of school and the higher the branches of scholarship taught. I ask my colleague and the committee to name the place on earth, outside the industrial North, where the children of laborers enjoy such benefits! I pause for a reply.

I will say to gentlemen from the South that one-half nearly of the tax burdens in that section are for school purposes, and I want to remark that these public schools are the idols of our hearts.

I have for fourteen years been giving employment to labor, and believe I am familiar with its wants and demands. I have yet to hear the first objection raised by any laborer against national tariff or State taxation.

I have often heard objections raised by them against the taxes levied by city councils, township trustees, and county commissioners, and the reason is plain—the tax burden that is heavy, the tax burden that is felt, is the direct one made by municipal, township, and county tax levies. The reason I have not heard objections to the State tax is because it is light, is not felt; and the reason why no objection is made to Government tariff taxation is because it is an indirect levy, one that is not felt by the people.

My distinguished colleague will find a complete answer to the financial condition of the wagemen of Indiana in the fact that at no other period in its history have so many homes been owned by wage-workers as now; and in the further fact that at no other time have they had so much money on deposit to their credit. The amount to their credit in the savings-banks of the State is $2,170,000, and I find by an inquiry in the district I have the honor to represent that about 40 per cent. of all the deposits in the national and private banks belongs to the wage-workers and farmers of the district. Take for illustration the First National Bank of Frankfort, Ind., just after the April payment of taxes, when deposits always run low. They have fifteen hundred depositors; of this number seven hundred are farmers and laborers. Out of a total deposit of $230,000, $85,000 belong to the laborers and farmers of Clinton County. I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that an inquiry in the other districts of the State would show an equal per cent. of the deposits in their banks to be the property of the wagemen and farmers that I find in the Ninth district.

I desire to call the attention of my colleague to the material prosperity of Indiana to-day as contrasted with what it was when the present tariff law was adopted; to the financial standing of the State now compared to what it was then; to the wealth of our people now as compared with their wealth then; to the financial condition of our farmers now with what it was then. I ask him to compare the comforts and conveniences of our farmers now with what they were then, their surplus money, the value of their farms, the kind of homes they live in now, the stock, herds, roads, and other evidences of thrift to be found everywhere among Indiana farmers, and contrast them with the same conditions when we adopted the protective principle in levying tariff duties, and then I challenge him to say that the policy has not been of incalculable value to Indiana farmers, laborers, mechanics, and Indiana capital, whose wealth has been increased more than $300,000,000.

If I had time I would tell him of our dependence then upon other governments and States for all our manufactured goods, plain woolens alone excepted—not a railway-bar mill, bar-iron mill, nail-mill, plow-works, car-shop, glass-works in the State. Now Indiana has the largest wagon and carriage, plow, and plate-glass works in the country. We make railway bars of steel and ingots of steel, nails, bar-iron, railway-cars, the finest polished plate-glass, furniture, woolen goods, giving employment to scores of thousands of laborers at good wages. These consumers are brought to the doors of our farmers, who thus find a ready home market for all the products of garden, field, and farm, until Indiana has become a hive of busy industry whose people are rapidly increasing in wealth and all the accomplishments which follow in its train.

At New Albany is located the great polished plate-glass works of the late W. C. De Pauw, one of the four successful works in America. Mr. De Pauw informed me not long before his death that he lost half a million in establishing the works before a cent of profit was made up on his investment (the loss sustained by reason of the Ohio floods was not included in this amount). He also informed me that he had never made in any one year more than 5 per cent. upon the capital invested, and he told me then, as his son, N. T. De Pauw, writes me now, that they can not stand a reduction in the tariff; that if a reduction is made one of two things must occur, the works must close down or they will be forced to reduce wages. I give a table of wages paid to laborers in plate-glass works in America, England, France, Germany, and Belgium:

The foregoing table shows almost the same increase of wages paid American glass-workers that is paid American tailors.

I want to add one illustration. In 1873 I had to buy, as trustee for another, some plate-glass. At that time American plate-glass had not been successfully made, and we were at the mercy of foreign plate-glass makers. I then paid $260 for foreign-made glass that I can now buy for $110, this reduction in price having been brought about by the building up of the plate-glass industries in our country and the creation of competition between home and foreign manufacturers. I will not vote to break down and close up or vote to make necessary a reduction of wages to an American industry that has in fifteen years reduced the cost to the consumer more than one-half, an industry that gives employment directly to 6,000 American laborers at double the wages paid to foreign plate-glass makers. I would vote to build up more works and to increase wages, but I will never vote to reduce them. I desire to say further to the committee, Mr. Chairman, that, while American plate-glass makers have reduced the price to consumers more than one-half, in addition the national Treasury has been enriched in the sum of $17,257,481.18 receipts from duty on plate-glass.

I am persuaded that every consideration demands the protection of all such American manufactures. Time forbids any further argument in this line. I know that a comparsion of facts will show the same results in any one of our manufactures. Such has been the result in all cases where investigations have been made. To emphasize the condition, if possible, of wage-workers who are most directly affected by our protective system, I ask my colleague to go with me to Massachusetts, the cradle and home of protection, as it is of liberty, where American industries have been fostered for many years, and where can be found stalwart advocates of protection to American wage-men. With less population than Indiana, we find that 848,787 of her laborers and mechanics have on deposit to their credit in their savings-banks the enormous sum of $274,098,413. If he is not yet convinced that they who produce the wealth have a share of it, I will ask him to go with me to Connecticut, land of invention and workshops. With only half the population of Indiana, 256,097 of her wage-workers have on deposit in their savings-banks the great sum of $92,481,425. If all his doubts are not removed, I would request him to journey with me to New York, where more than 1,000,000 of her laborers—to be exact, where 1,208,072 wage-workers have placed to their credit in their savings-banks the marvelous sum of $457,050,250. I tell my colleague here in these savings-banks are the savings of a part of those who have under our protective system created the wealth of the North by honest labor well rewarded.

To enable these truths to become indelibly impressed upon the tablets of his memory, I invite him to examine the statistics of the nine great manufacturing States, Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Vermont, where 2,944,731 wage-workers have on deposit in their savings-banks $1,033,279,827, a sum almost equal to the national debt. What more evidence can be wanted? What more conclusive answer to the query of my colleague can be made? What clearer refutation of the charge that protection impoverishes labor is possible? I say to my colleague, Mr. BYNUM, my dear sir, you are mistaken in your query, "Why is it that the great mass of the people have no share in the wealth that has been wrought by their hands?" They do have. The great number of 2,944,731 of them, in nine States, have placed to their credit the enormous sum $1,033,279,827 of the wealth that was wrought by their hands, and these people are the wage-workers under the protective system your President has seen proper to style the "vicious, illogical, and iniquitous source of taxation;" and as I read the history of the past twenty-seven years of my country, note its mavelous growth in wealth, see how the cost to the consumer has been reduced one-half by reason of the competition fostered and built up under our wise industrial policy, whereby protection to American labor and American industries has been the central idea, and when I try to comprehend the quantity of the savings of those directly benefited in only nine States, over $1,000,000,000 earned—ay, earned and saved under that system of protection President Cleveland styles "vicious, illogical, iniquitous"—I am reminded of the expression of a Hoosier who, as he in his ignorance imagined, had been converted, and who, when called upon soon thereafter to pray in public, had the audacity to begin his prayer by exclaiming, "Oh, thou logical, rogical, diabolical God!"

I place the famous expression of President Cleveland, who in an official message to this House, in speaking of the protective features of our tariff laws, a system which has, as it has been clearly shown, in twenty-seven years quadrupled our wealth, made America the greatest manufacturing nation on earth, enabled our wage-workers to place on deposit out of their savings a sum $200,000,000 larger than all the combined savings of laborers in Europe; a system which has brought our national currency to par and made our national credit the best of any Government on earth; a system that has provided money to defray the current expenses of Government, and pay off seventeen hundred millions of the principal of the war debt; a system which has reduced the cost to consumers one-half, and enables American wagemen to be paid the highest wages on earth; a system that has done all these things and left a large surplus in the Treasury—I repeat, I place President Cleveland's famous expression in reference to this system, which he styles the "vicious, illogical, iniquitous source of unnecessary taxation," alongside the one where the tyro in religion prayed to God as the "logical, rogical, diabolical God," and I present them, Mr. Chairman, as companion pieces of ignorance of the plainest fundamental principles of the subjects under consideration when they were uttered.

DEMOCRACY OPPOSED TO PROTECTION.

My distinguished friend, Mr. MCCOMAS, of Maryland, in his speech of May 2, in speaking of the bill now pending, said:

Has any friend of this bill in this debate uttered one sentence in favor of the American tariff system, which discriminates in favor of the home producer and laborer?

He paused and yielded time for a reply, whereupon the eloquent member from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] replied. I quote from the RECORD of May 3:

Mr. HOOKER. No. There was no one, and you will not hear any Democrat utter one.

That statement will not be forgotten. I want to publicly thank the distinguished gentleman for that frank, clear, honest, and conclusive statement:

No. There was no one, and you will not hear any Democrat utter one.

It is refreshing after years of doubt to know from so high an authority that no Democrat here upon this floor will utter a word in favor of the American tariff system, which has wrought such marvelous development for American industries. I read the words, Mr. Chairman, and then I thought that the distinguished Democratic leader from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and his colleagues were Democrats. Mr. RANDALL has been in Congress for a quarter of a century, has won honorable party leadership along the line of this industrial problem. I have yet to hear of his ever being accused of writing, speaking, working, or voting for any other than the Democratic party and all of its candidates, and I submit if twenty-five years of continuous public service for the Democratic party can be so easily and summarily dispensed with. I say to the gentlemen of the South that Mr. Cleveland owes his election to Mr. RANDALL'S influence in New York and New Jersey.

I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that the distinguished gentleman, Mr. HOOKER, voiced not only his own sentiments, but also those of his people when he uttered the words I have quoted. The people of his section, I regret to say, since 1832, when they became thoroughly imbued with the pernicious doctrines of the great leader in South Carolina, Mr. Calhoun, have not deemed it wise or proper to support legislation in Congress which would tend to establish an American system of industrial development, that would protect American interests and foster and build up American industries; and yet, Mr. Chairman, I have asked myself this question, What interests can possibly lie nearer the hearts of my distinguished friend, Mr. HOOKER, and those of his constituents, than the interests of the American people? We are all Americans—the people of Maine and those of Texas, the people of Mississippi and those of Indiana—and I must, as an American, feel a just pride in any policy which brings blessings and plenty to any section of my country.

I concede the fact that the leaders of the South since 1832 have fought the principle of protection and the American industrial policy; fought it persistently, bravely, openly; upon the forum, in this Hall, at the ballot-box, and upon hundreds of battle-fields. The great war of the rebellion was brought about for the sole purpose of creating a government whose fundamental principles should be human slavery and free trade. The constitution of the so-called Confederate States provided among other things that its congress should be clothed with the authority—

To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises for revenue necessary to pay the debts, provide for the common defense, and carry on the government of the Confederate States; but no bounties shall be granted from the treasury; nor shall any duties or taxes on importations from foreign nations be laid to promote or foster any branch of industry; and all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the Confederate States.

That is free trade, pure and simple.

Before the war the institution of slavery, which existed only in the South, demanded as its companion-piece in their industrial system free trade. They were complements of each other, and I can readily see and understand why before the war and so long as the people of the South had slavery they should favor free trade and oppose the principle of protection, because the latter would be antagonistic to the institution of slavery. The war has changed all these conditions. A new era has dawned upon our country, the cause for sectionalism has been removed, and there is no longer any reason in theory or in fact, why the people of one section of the Union shall oppose a principle which the history of the past and our own experience teaches us has benefited all classes in every community where it has been adopted. I point my colleagues of the South to the cotton and iron manufacturies which, under the present protective system, have been established in Georgia, Tennessee, and Alabama, and ask them if their coming has not largely increased the value of real estate and benefited the farmers and laborers of that section.

I invite the gentlemen to go with me among the workmen in the industrial centers of the North, ascertain the number of the homes they own—millions of homes earned and paid for out of the savings of their daily toil. Let us examine their savings of money on deposit in the laborers' banks, the savings-banks of that section—in round numbers three millions of depositors, with more than a thousand millions of dollars to their credit. Let us visit their homes, their schools, their reading rooms, their societies, where we shall find many evidences of plenty, contentment, and even the luxuries of life; and then when we have done this I ask my colleagues of the South to contrast the condition of these wagemen, their homes, schools, savings, and general surroundings and intelligence, with those of the South, of England, or anywhere else on earth, and then they will see and know why the Republican party, representative of the great loyal, liberty-loving, and American-imbued North, accepted the wager of battle tendered them in 1861 and fought to a successful conclusion the war to preserve the nationality of the Union. The great loyal heart of the North believed that labor should be made a king, not a slave.

They believed that freedom was the birth-right and heritage of every American citizen; and that every citizen was entitled to the amplest protection in life, liberty, and business. So thoroughly imbued are the Republicans with this theory of equal rights and protection that I challenge my colleagues upon the other side of the Chamber to name one Republican voting precinct in any State from Maine to Oregon where there is not absolute protection of the sacred right of the ballot. There can not be found one Republican voting precinct anywhere where the humblest citizen, native or foreign born, black or white, who is a legal voter, can not go openly and freely as becomes a freeman, and vote for the men of his choice, have his vote counted as it was cast, and the result honestly announced. So deeply and thoroughly are Republicans imbued with this doctrine of protection for all in all their rights of citizenship that the man who would oppose it would be as one in fifty thousand.

The Republican masses and the great industrial North are in favor of equal rights and protection; protection of national unity; protection of the equality of citizenship whereby one vote in Indiana shall equal one vote from any other State in this House and in the councils of the nation; protection of American manufactures and laborers by a wisely devised protective-tariff system. "Ah, my dear sir," says one of my colleagues of the South, "Do you not know that your protective system is a giant robber?" My reply is, "My dear sir, I can not comprehend your meaning when you call protection a robber. I look into the national Treasury and see that it brings into it the money required by the wants of the Government? I talk with the men who have their money invested in American industries, and they tell me, 'We do not want a change.' I go among the great mass of the people—those who buy and consume the products of these protected industries—and they tell me, 'We now buy our articles at one-half the price we paid before we built up these industries and made them ourselves; we are not robbed at all.' I then seek an interview with the bread-winners, the men who toil; we talk over the whole situation and contrast conditions under different systems; some of them have fled from the oppressions of free trade and know from experience, the best of all teachers, the 'God's truth about the whole business.' They tell me, 'We own more homes, have more money saved, receive better wages, than any other bread-winners on earth. The system does not rob us, and we ask you to let well enough alone.' Upon inquiry I learn that our national wealth has increased 400 per cent. in twenty-eight years of this robbery, four of those years being a period of cruel, devastating war, and I wonder who has been robbed. Surely not America, nor her people, for they have grown rich beyond comparison with any other people on earth during the same time."

Mr. Chairman, protection is not robbery. It is a blessing both to the Government and the people. It has been a blessing to the United States of America since 1861, when the present policy went into operation. There comes to me, Mr. Chairman, a voice from out of the experience of the past which says to me that it is the highest duty of the legislator in this Government of the people to enact laws whereby the people shall be fully protected in all their rights; hence I am in favor of protecting the unity of the nation, protecting the purity and equality of the ballot, protecting the honor of my country, protecting American industries, and protecting American labor from being forced to accept the cheaper wages paid to free-trade European bread-winners.

DEMOCRACY AND MONOPOLY.

The distinguished gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], in speaking of tariff reform and Democracy, April 30, said "I want it to be of that kind that can point to Mount Vernon's shades and Monticello's heights and say that from the day of its birth it has been the mortal enemy of monopoly." And as I read I wondered, Mr. Chairman, if it could be possible that my eloquent colleague had forgotten the history of this generation. The head and heart and soul of Democracy have not been, nor are they now, the "mortal enemy of monopoly" from its birth. Upon the contrary, not content with advocating the claims of the giant monopoly of the century—human slavery—within the jurisdiction of the Government, they actually endeavored to withdraw from the Union and organize a confederacy, the chief corner-stone of which was to be the giant monopoly, human slavery. The Democratic party of to-day is the open ally, the avowed champion, the chief support of the greatest monopoly of this age, the whisky league, a monopoly that is not content with controlling the whisky business, but assumes to dictate political policies, control party management, and corrupt elections by bribing electors and election officers, and Old Sumptuary will once more be called into service at St. Louis in June to sound the key-note of the new alliance of 1888, entered into between the Democratic party and the Whisky League of America.

I desire to remind my distinguished friend of another fact which shows how the souls of Democratic leaders yearn for a chance to become the "mortal enemy of monopoly." I refer him and the committee to the metal schedule in the bill under consideration, and to the item of steel railway bars. Under existing laws the tariff is $17 a ton. It is proposed to reduce the tariff on railway bars to $11 a ton, a reduction of $6 a ton, or a fraction over 35 per cent.; and for whose benefit? For the sole benefit of the railroad monopolists of America. I concede that the majority report tries to theorize and show that if the tariff is reduced the cost of building railroads will be cheapened, and then freights and fare will also be cheapened. I say, however, and I appeal to the history and experience of the past to prove the truth of the saying, that the rates of fare and freight are not in any way whatever affected by the tariff on railway bars, but are agreed upon and adjusted in advance, at least annually, by the great trunk lines, when they meet to make assignments of per cents. of traffic to competing lines. And yet so intense and burning is the desire of the Democratic party to become the "mortal enemy of monopoly" that it would reduce the tariff on railway bars $6 a ton, thereby seriously crippling the rail-mills of the country, with all the scores of millions of invested capital, and largely reduce the wages of all the thousands of workmen in these mills; and for whose benefit? For the sole benefit of the railway monopolists of America and the rail-makers of Europe; while by the provisions of the pending bill it is proposed to levy and collect $45,000,000 a year from sugar, a prime necessity of life.

Mr. Chairman, just imagine the force of the declaration of Democracy's "mortal hatred of monopoly" in the bill under consideration, wherein Democracy makes a reduction of 35 per cent. in favor of railway monopolists and only 20 per cent. on sugar, a prime necessity of life. The majority report of the bill under consideration places the total value of all manufactured products in America last year at $7,000,000,000. The amount of wages paid to American laborers to make these products was $1,400,000,000. The sum of money that would have been paid in Germany to labor to make the same products would have been $616,000,000, and in England English laborers would have been paid $784,000,000. The total amount of tariff collected last year was $217,286,893, therefore I say to the gentleman that the difference paid to the workmen here in America above the wages paid either in Germany or England is nearly equal to three times the total sum of tariff taxes levied and collected.

TABLE OF PRODUCTS, LABOR AND TARIFF.

Amount of manufactures	$7,000,000,000
Wages paid to make them in America	1,400,000,000
Wages paid to make them in Germany	616,000,000
Excess of wages paid in America	784,000,000
Wages paid to make them in America	1,400,000,000
Wages paid to make them in England	784,000,000
Excess of wages paid in America	616,000,000

Let us charge the whole tariff levy to labor and see how the balance will stand:

American pay-roll in excess of pay-roll in Germany	$784,000,000
Deduct total amount of tariff	217,286,893
Balance to credit of American wages	566,713,107
American pay-roll in excess of pay-roll in England	616,000,000
Deduct total tariff duties	217,286,893
Balance to credit of American wages	398,713,107

Mr. Chairman, I am astonished, that with full knowledge of the very great difference paid in wages here and in Europe, that gentlemen will seriously insist that the way to reduce the revenue of the Government is to reduce the rate of duty. If the Mills bill shall become a law without amendment I predict that, instead of reducing, it will double our revenues, close down the greater part of our manufacturing industries, and place our laborers in enforced idleness.

I call the attention of the committee to the history of increased imports in 1835 and in 1857, immediately after material changes in our tariff laws, and to the very large excess of wages paid in America above those paid in Germany and in England to manufacture the products of last year, as the reasons why this result will surely follow until the accumulated wealth of our wagemen, an amount over one thousand millions, shall become exhausted. There is only one practical way to reduce the revenues of the Government, and that is to increase the free-list and also increase the rate of duty levied upon importations, and thereby decrease the quantity of importations upon which duties are levied. The adoption of such a policy would surely reduce the revenues of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, there is another monopoly in existence in this country; a monopoly that is inimical to the peace, the prosperity, and the happiness of the people. This monopoly is an active, aggressive factor; it will not tolerate opposition, and is so constituted that its charter may become perpetual. It is insolent in its demands, imperial in its methods, un-American in its tendencies, and yet, strange as it may appear, Democracy is not the "mortal enemy" of this monopoly.

Democracy loves political power. The monopoly I refer to exercises autocratic political power in the name of the solid South. The Democratic party, through this monopoly—the solid South—arrogates to itself the right to count and claim all the votes of that section. It will not tolerate opposition to its purposes. It has demonstrated a new problem—that a unanimous vote can be greater than the vote cast.

Democracy may not be united upon other questions, but it is upon its monopoly of the right to receive votes in the South. I have heard it said, and believe the saying to be true, that if there is any one idol that is more precious than all others to Democracy, any one central idea around which the head and body, the heart and soul of Democracy love to rally, as its chosen leaders ponder over and fully contemplate the length and breadth, the height and depth of Democracy's "mortal hatred of monopoly," it is its darling pet—the solid South. The alliance between them is both offensive and defensive. How disconsolate indeed would modern Democracy be without its monopoly of the solid South. To contemplate Democracy without the solid South could only be equaled by an effort to contemplate the play of Rip Van Winkle with the character of Old Rip left out. When the days of this monopoly are ended, the mission of Democracy will be completed. Democracy can not exist without its monopoly of the solid South. They are one and inseparable, as much so, Mr. Chairman, as were the famous Siamese twins of that section.

A MATERIAL REDUCTION OF REVENUE MEANS OPPOSITION TO PENSIONS.

Mr. Chairman, I am not in favor of any material reduction of the revenues of the Government. No greater mistake could be made by Congress than to largely decrease the revenues at this time. The funded debt of the Government is over $1,200,000,000, two hundred millions and more of which fall due inside of five years. The current expenses of Government exceed three hundred millions a year. There is a great outstanding debt not yet adjudicated, which will run up into hundreds of millions of dollars, claims pending for half a century. Besides all these there are now pending in the Pension Department in this city one hundred thousand claims of Union soldiers and their loved ones; claims for pension which ought to be allowed; claims that are as legal, just, and binding as claims can be; claims that can not be allowed under existing laws, because of technical failure of proof. The Government owes these heroes a sacred debt, and it should by a general law enable these claims to be allowed. To meet all these solemn obligations will require sixty millions or more and thereafter largely increase the annual pension-list. We can not enact a law which will secure so large a measure of justice to the people as one which shall provide for these claimants. We should by a general law provide for every Union soldier who is now broken in health, and for all the widows and children of deceased Union soldiers.

The Government very wisely pensioned all the Mexican war veterans at the age of sixty-two. I say, sir, and with all due respect to those veteran heroes, that great and honorable as their services were, they become dwarfed into insignificance when compared with the services rendered the Government by the Union soldiers. The Union soldiers won the greatest victory of all the ages in behalf of humanity. They saved the United States to the arts of peace and industrial development. They preserved the unity of the nation and rescued our flag from destruction and made it the proud emblem of a government of the people, whose chief glory is that the people are equal before the law. The Union soldiers saved this temple of human hopes and of liberty protected by law to bless all the countless millions who shall occupy it.

Who can measure the obligation we owe these Union soldiers? They risked life for country and humanity. What more could they do? What better evidence of consecrated devotion could be presented? Having done so much for the Government, I now demand that in the hour of the nation's prosperity, when its Treasury groans beneath its weight of silver and gold, when all the current obligations are met and there still remains a surplus, that the Government these heroes saved shall properly care for all of them and their widows and children. Care for them as a Government of the people should care for its citizen soldiers who in the hour of its greatest peril risked life in its behalf.

Mr. Chairman, I can not speak for other members; I cannot know into what lines of thought and action duty may call them. I do know this, however, that, on behalf of the million surviving comrades of the Union Army, the men to whom we are indebted for all the blessings of constitutional liberty and a Government of the people, I shall oppose any and all material reductions of the revenues of the Government until all its solemn obligations to all these Union soldiers, for pay, bounty, and pensions, shall have been fully paid. I shall insist that the promises made these soldiers shall be sacredly kept by the Government; every promise to every soldier, and to his widow and his children. The surplus is theirs. It belongs of right to the men who saved not only the surplus, but the Government itself, from total destruction.

Again, Mr. Chairman, one of the results of the late war was the enfranchisement of the colored race—a race that had been held in legal bondage under the laws of the land. Other laws made the act of teaching them to read and think for themselves a crime punishable by fine and imprisonment. The law not only held them in slavery, it also kept them in ignorance. The war has changed their legal status; then they were slaves; now they are citizens, equal before the law with their more highly favored brothers of Saxon origin, and every consideration of national honor and safety demands that this race be educated and through it be made capable of exercising intelligently the rights and duties of citizenship, intelligence being one of the greatest safeguards of the state. The presence of slavery in the South made ignorance the birthright and heritage of all the poor white people of that section, and to them education should be sent. I hold, Mr. Chairman—and it is the judgment of the people I have the honor to represent as well as my own—that, under these circumstances, the line of duty is very plain for the Government to pursue. The least it can do, the least it ought to do, is to take out of its overflowing Treasury not less than $12,000,000 a year, and expend it in organizing and aiding the public schools in the South. The Government made the slaves citizens; it should qualify them for citizenship and then let them alone to work out as a race their own destiny.

There is no justice in or need of the direct tax on cigar-dealers and druggists. These should be removed. This would decrease the revenue three millions. No man can justify the levying of a revenue tax on alcohol used in the arts. This tax should be removed. There are known safeguards which will prevent the alcohol used for that purpose from ever being used as a beverage. This would reduce the revenue not less than eight millions. More than 25 per cent. of the tariff revenue of 1887 was paid on sugar—a prime necessity; an article that enters into use in every home, whether it be the cottage of the laborer or the palace of the millionaire. It is not a protective tariff beyond the sum of six millions of dollars, because of the fact that we do not produce over one-tenth the sugar we consume. Of the vast sum of fifty-eight millions of duty derived from the tariff on sugar, it therefore follows that six millions operates as a protection to American sugar, and the enormous sum of fifty-two millions of the sugar tariff was a tariff for revenue, pure and simple, and that levied on a prime necessity of life.

The bill under consideration proposes to raise the great sum of forty-five millions a year of tariff revenue from sugar, a necessity in every American home, and I shall enter my protest against such a burden being laid on sugar. It is not a tariff levied with a view of protecting American sugar beyond the sum of $6,000,000, but will, if adopted, make sugar bear a direct revenue tariff of $39,000,000 a year. The Government can pay a direct bounty on every pound of sugar produced in America for a period of nine years, levy a tariff on imported sugar to pay the bounty to American sugar, and if under the stimulus of a direct bounty the amount produced shall increase from one-tenth to one-half the quantity our people consume, they will save in nine years time, by the adoption of the bounty system and the repeal of the present unjust and outrageous sugar tariff, the sum of at least $220,000,000. No man can be a consistent protectionist and advocate and favor the levying of a tariff on sugar, which will bring into the Treasury forty-five million a year—a sum of money which is and must be a revenue tariff pure and simple, and that too collected upon a necessity in every home.

USE THE SURPLUS TO RESTORE SILVER TO PAR.

When our fathers adopted the standard of values for our Government upon which should be based the financial transactions of Government and people, they said silver and gold shall be the standards, and they adopted a ratio between these precious metals. Their action was eminently wise, conservative, just. From the day, long centuries ago, when for thirty pieces of silver a burial place was purchased, to this hour, silver has changed less in intrinsic value than gold. The same fact holds good in the history of our own country. Certain holders of bonded securities have for years been actively engaged in an effort to have the leading governments of earth adopt a single-coin standard, and that to be gold. No friend of humanity, no friend of this Government of the people, can advocate that measure. No more pernicious legislation can be conceived than an act to reduce the standard of values one-half by demonetizing one of the two precious metals. Its effect would be to double the wealth of every creditor and double the debt of every debtor, thus creating an impassable barrier between poverty and wealth. America is a coin-producing country, large quantities of both silver and gold being produced each year; hence it follows that the Government should, by every known legal enactment, and by every recognized diplomatic policy known, exert its great influence in favor of keeping and maintaining both standards at par. At this time, and for a few years past, the bullion value of our silver dollar has been, and is, worth less in the money markets than the bullion value of gold. What have we done to restore the equilibrium of values? Nothing, absolutely nothing. What are we doing to-day? Nothing whatever.

We produce about fifty millions of silver a year. All our national debt and private debts are based on it as one of the two equal standards, and yet when there is a deliberate effort made to demonetize silver, and thus destroy its value as a standard of other values, with the national Treasury overflowing we sit idly by and do absolutely nothing to arrest the depreciation of silver. Under existing law the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to purchase and coin two millions of silver every month. If the Government would go upon the markets and purchase double that sum, buy four millions a month, in less than two years' time silver would be equal to its former value, and once more equal to gold. The Government has made $30,000,000 out of the coinage of silver, therefore the Government can well afford to make an investment in silver, the inevitable result of which will be to pull the whole mass of silver up to par with gold in all the nations of earth. The Government owes this effort to place the metals at par on the old ratio to the people and business interests, not only of our Government, but the world.

Mr. Chairman, it may be wise statesmanship to take 125 or 126 cents of the people's money and go upon the markets and buy with it 100 cents of the people's paper. I repeat, it may be wise, businesslike, and economic statesmanship to do that thing if it be, I am not able to see it in that light. I can not believe it is a wise policy to do that; yet the Secretary of the Treasury is doing that very thing. Recently, when the bill was under consideration to increase the circulation of national banks from 90 to 100 per cent. of the face value of the bonds deposited to secure the circulation, I was amused as I contemplated the anomaly of Congress trying by the enactment of one law to increase the value of the outstanding Government bonds, while by another bill then pending it proposed to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to go upon the market and buy the very same bonds out of the surplus in the people's Treasury. I would, if I could, authorize the Secretary to go upon the market and buy silver with the surplus. If bondholders in Europe and America continued their efforts to depreciate silver, I would let them know that Uncle Sam was the backer of silver to the amount that he had decided that the law which has been in existence for nearly a century, which said that 412½ grains of 900 fine silver, stamped with the sovereignty of the United States as being a dollar, was a dollar, and should be so received and accepted everywhere; and when this is done it will be because it is known that Uncle Sam's resources are beyond computation.

Doubting Thomases predicted in 1861 that the Union would be destroyed. Uncle Sam said it should not be. The Union exists, and is one and inseparable. Then these same people declared that the war debt could never, no, never be paid. Uncle Sam very quietly and yet firmly declared it shall be paid, every dollar of it, and I will show you how to enable the people to pay it and at the same time enrich themselves; and then he started up an American industrial system that has been and is the marvel of the ages, and, lo and behold, how rapidly that debt disappears. Every dollar that is due is paid, and a great surplus balance in the Treasury.

Whenever Uncle Sam shall lay his hand on the silver problem and say it shall be taken and accepted as an equal standard of values with gold, according to the law fixing the ratio adopted by our fathers, it will be so accepted, because the resources of Uncle Sam are illimitable. Silver is distinctively the people's money. Uncle Sam is the representative of the people's Government. He should utilize the surplus in his Treasury in buying silver and restoring it to par with gold. It is his coin. Silver should be Americanized fully and completely, like our industrial policy, and when this is done it will be at par. When we authorize the purchase of silver instead of bonds out of the surplus in the Treasury we shall confer a lasting blessing on this generation by a restoration of the equality of values, and by inaugurating an era of unprecedented prosperity in all the avenues of business, and thereby confer a blessing upon all the sons and daughters of toil.

Mr. PLUMB Mr. Chairman, the question before the committee, which has been so long and so ably discussed, is, under the present state of public affairs, a broad one. It reaches far beyond any paltry cent per cent. view of rates of duties to be demanded on this or that importation; it comprises within its ample outline the surplus in the Treasury, debt payment, internal-revenue taxation, a proper economic system for the country, and thus affects the prosperity and happiness of every citizen of the United States.

The settlement of this question involves the supremacy, if not the very existence, of the political parties of the day, and with them the different policies they propose to pursue in administering the affairs of the Government. It, moreover, goes to the very bottom of the social condition of the various sections of the Union, both as to what these conditions now are and what they are to be.

Taken with our system of money, with which it is intimately connected, it is by far the most important that in time of peace interests and affects the American people. In what I may say upon this occasion I do not propose to enter upon a discussion of the principal provisions of the Mills bill so called. Others who have addressed the House on both sides of this Chamber have given special attention to the details of this measure, and it has been shown that whatever is its purpose, it is an ill-advised and unsatisfactory bill, which if enacted into law, would deal a death-blow to our system of protection.

It is with such a view that I shall offer to the committee the ideas I entertain on this great question. In so doing I shall speak plainly, especially of such public men as are actors in the important events now transpiring, not for the purpose of traducing them personally, but in the exercise of the privilege of a member on this floor to criticise every public officer for his official acts.

I shall refer to the surplus in the Treasury and the course pursued by the President in relation to it, as well as his determined purpose to overthrow protection. I shall refer to the course of the Speaker of the House in the appointment of the Ways and Means Committee and of the fitness of that committee to discharge the duties thereof, and shall endeavor to show that ever since this Administration came into power a plan has existed which has at length ripened into a conspiracy to cause the Democratic party to entirely change front, both on the question of protection and of taxation by means of internal revenue.

SURPLUS.

When President Cleveland was inaugurated there were less than $10,000,000 in the public Treasury applicable to the payment of the public debt, the administrations that preceded him having pursued faithfully the Republican policy of using the surplus to pay the debt and stop interest. But not so Mr. Cleveland; although there were subject to call enough 3 per cent. bonds to absorb the accumulations in the Treasury, some nine months were suffered to pass and nearly a hundred millions had accumulated before the Treasury began to call for these bonds.

The evils of such financial management were clearly understood by the President, for in his message he says:

> The public Treasury, which should only exist as a conduit conveying the people's tribute to its legitimate objects of expenditure, becomes a hoarding-place for money needlessly withdrawn from trade and the people's use, thus crippling our national energies, suspending our country's development, preventing investment in productive enterprise, threatening financial disturbance, and inviting schemes of public plunder.

And, what is more, this Administration came into power demanding that the surplus be used for paying the public debt; and yet this same Administration, guided by this same President, inaugurated a financial policy which violated not only every doctrine laid down in his message, but a prominent plank in the platform of his party, and he has continued to do so to this very hour.

Mr. Chairman, there is not now, nor has there been since December 1, 1873, any legal necessity for ceasing to pay off the public debt, and no Republican administration has faltered in the work of debt payment. The law as it stands in the statute-books, and as it stood before and since any of the 4½ and 4 per cent. bonds were issued, provides for the redemption and payment of the public debt whenever conditions exist such as have prevailed ever since this Administration came into power.

Sir, I deny emphatically that there is a dollar of surplus in the Treasury.

How is it possible to have a surplus when the Government debt exceeds one thousand millions of dollars, nearly all of which sum is represented by bonds that were issued under a statute which reserves to the Government the right to redeem them before maturity under certain prescribed conditions which now exist? Would any business man or banker dare to report a surplus in a statement of his private affairs under similar circumstances?

If General Andrew Jackson was now in the Presidential chair, does any one think he would be paying a premium to bondholders? No, sir; far from it. It is left to this Administration to put its hands into the Treasury and pay in premiums millions of dollars, when the law clearly points to a payment of the principal and interest of the debt with no premium added, and for one I can not resist the conclusion that had he been as true to the people in this matter as he has ever been to the hoarder of capital he would not have asked for Congressional sanction as a shield and excuse for not relieving the tax-payers of the country from the payment of premiums for the sole benefit of a small but powerful class of bondholders.

But, Mr. Chairman, this financial jugglery had another object, which was to obtain Congressional assent to the avowal made in his message that—

> In considering the question of purchasing bonds as a means of restoring to circulation the surplus money in the Treasury it should be borne in mind that premiums must of course be paid upon such purchases, and that a large part of these bonds could not be purchased at any price—a proposition which contemplated that the bonds would become too dear to purchase, which would justify an attack on the principles of protection to American industries as the only means left for the reduction of the surplus.

It is pertinent to ask here, Mr. Chairman, why the House of Representatives, with a Democratic majority of 41 in the Forty-ninth Congress, did not pass a measure which would have effectually provided against the surplus then in the Treasury—the surplus complained of by the President, and for which the Speaker, on taking the chair, urged Congress for a speedy enactment of some substantial measure of relief. It was in the power of the Speaker to have constituted the Ways and Means Committee without changing the number of good and true Democrats on it, so that a measure would have been reported from it and passed the House which would have corrected the inequalities of the tariff and reduced taxation without attacking or endangering protection to labor, so essential to the prosperity of all our people

Mr. Chairman, it was the earnest desire of the constituents of a large majority of gentlemen then on this floor to have had this done, and but for the power exercised for its defeat by the Speaker, it would have been done then. Sir, the gentleman from Kentucky, who presides over our deliberations, receives and is entitled to the confidence and respect of this body, regardless of party, for the able and impartial manner in which he discharges his duty as a parliamentarian; but, sir, as impartial as he may be in deciding questions of order, it can not be denied that he and he alone is accountable for the existence of the surplus in the Treasury. Sir, if there be in the history of financial legislation a more flagrant exercise of political power than this, I know not where it is to be found. But, sir, this is not all. The committee appointed by the Speaker again and again refused to permit the majority of the House to vote upon such effective measures for disposing of the surplus as to them seemed best.

Mr. Chairman, it is perfectly plain that all that was thus done to retain the surplus in the Treasury was in pursuance of a well matured plan and for a well understood purpose, which was nothing less than to furnish an excuse for an attack upon protection—a plan which was as fully entertained by the President as by the Speaker. If any doubt exists as to this, the remarkable message of the President will at once dispel that doubt. On the question of the surplus he has spoken with all the solemnity of a state paper. He has deemed his dictum on this subject to be of so much importance as to justify himself in an absolute refusal to follow the direction given in the Constitution, as understood and followed by every one of his predecessors from Washington to Arthur. That instrument says:

> The President shall from time to time give the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

This is his plain duty, "but whatsoever is more than this cometh of evil." The President has informed Congress as to the condition of the Treasury, and no one has a right to criticise the language employed for that purpose; but, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that when the Chief Magistrate goes further than to give information, and not only recommends for our consideration measures, but passes judgment in advance on the different methods by which the end desired may be reached, commending as he does one method of taxation and condemning another as vicious, both being constitutional, and each having been adopted by the Government ever since it had an existence, that high functionary betrays either a lack of regard for the requirements of the Constitution or an unwarranted desire to dictate to a co-ordinate branch of the Government what legislation it must adopt.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

I have already pointed to the President's stubborn refusal to dispose of the surplus and have not shown the subterfuges which have been resorted to in order not to do the very thing he was clothed with power to accomplish, and I next call attention to the new position he has taken on the subject of internal-revenue taxes, and which, at his instigation, the Democratic party is expected to take on that question.

The Democratic platform of 1884 declares that—

> From the foundation of this Government taxes collected at the custom-houses have been the chief source of Federal revenue, and such they must continue to be. The internal revenue is a war tax. We denounce the Republican party for having failed to relieve the people of crushing war taxes.

Every one of the above declarations was Democratic gospel when Mr. Cleveland was nominated as the standard-bearer of the party, and to these propositions there was no dissent. It has been the boast of Democracy that its principles never change. They were time-honored and immutable; but alas! for these degenerate days, this cry can no longer suffice to give confidence and comfort to the hearts of the Bourbons. Their new President has for some reason made a new platform covering the issue I have quoted, and his chosen Secretary of the Treasury uses his influence to aid in foisting a new and different doctrine of finance on the party and on the country from that of 1884. The President insists that internal revenue shall remain as a part of our system of taxation, and the Secretary of the Treasury, after conceding that internal taxation is a war measure, says that it should not be done away with, but should be installed as a permanent part of our system.

Why this right about face, Mr. Chairman, and from whence comes the authority of a junto of Democratic leaders to commit the lesser lights of the party to such a new departure? Surely something occult must account for this radical change of front, and to bring this hidden something to light will be my endeavor.

Bear in mind, Mr. Chairman, the President well knew that no important changes in our protective system would be tolerated as long as surplus was employed in reducing the public debt, nor as long as the expressed sentiment of all parties in favor of dispensing with internal-revenue taxes known as war taxes remained unchanged. We have seen in what manner he has maneuvered with debt reduction and the surplus, and we now see with what deliberation he repudiates the Democratic platform in regard to the removal of the internal-revenue or war tax, both being necessary in order to have an excuse to attack protection. I know, Mr. Chairman, that the President has protested over and over again that such is not the object, but "he doth protest too much" with his words. Let the argument of his message speak on this point.

The President states that the sum of one hundred and thirteen millions will be on hand as a surplus in the Treasury on the 30th of June next, the close of the fiscal year, and this sum he claims measures the excess of taxation which he insists must be reduced by that amount; and he further declares against any reduction in internal revenue which now amounts to one hundred and twenty millions per annum. So when one figures out these propositions they find them to mean that one hundred and thirteen millions should be taken from revenues now collected annually from customs. These collections for the last fiscal year amounted to $217,000,000; now, if you follow the President's figures and reduce this sum by one hundred and thirteen millions, which ought not, as he insists, to be levied, there would remain only one hundred and four millions to be collected annually as duties on imported goods, a reduction of nearly 50 per cent. on the present amount.

These estimates and these propositions are of the President's own making, and they show to what extent he proposes to reduce the tariff. I know, Mr. Chairman, that none of the President's supporters on this floor dare adopt his bold utterances on the amount of reduction to be insisted upon, for they well understand that it would be impolitic to do so now, but there the figures stand, and they show how thoroughly the President is committed to the destruction of protection, for who can not see that it would be impossible to reduce the tariff 50 per cent. without bringing absolute destruction upon every important manufacturing industry in the land.

So, instead of striking the full blow at once, as the proposals of the message clearly indicate, the Mills bill is brought forward; not as a full expression of the free-trade idea now, but as one more possible to adopt and just as sure to accomplish that destruction in the end.

Mr. Chairman, the personnel of the Ways and Means Committee of the present Congress shows unmistakably that the interests of the majority of the people was not considered in its formation. I have no wish or desire by thought or word to in the least disparage any of the gentlemen composing that committee. They are not to be blamed for accepting the high position assigned to them by the Speaker. They each and all of them have ability and attainments which entitle them to the respect of those who know them, but they are not in sympathy with the people of this country on the economic questions committed to their charge. This is not strange, as will appear when we consider their antecedents and surroundings.

The committee consists nominally of thirteen members, five of whom are Republicans and eight Democrats, but six of the latter come from States recently under the thraldom of slavery, namely, Texas, Arkansas, Kentucky, Georgia, and West Virginia—these States thus furnishing six-eighths of this important committee; and I say this advisedly, for while there are nominally five Republican members, the bill comes solely from the eight Democratic members, not one of the Republicans having been permitted to see the bill or even to know a single syllable it was to contain until it had been published to the country. Every Republican on that committee might as well have been at their homes as dancing attendance at the committee-room while this bill was being formulated. It is a delusion to think that there were thirteen members on that committee; there were but eight, the five appointed from manufacturing States and favoring protection were absolutely ignored; they were not permitted to participate in the work of the committee, and were not recognized as having any right to act or to have a voice in its deliberations; and of the eight practically constituting the committee, six, as I have shown, come from a particular section.

Mr. Chairman, look next at the antecedents of these six members. Examine their surroundings with a view to determine their fitness for a proper discharge of the duties imposed upon them. Look at the States from whence they come. Does Texas furnish any such practical knowledge of the various interests to be affected as justifies clothing one of her Representatives with such power as the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee possesses? When at home does he reside in a district having diversified industries? Before I close I will present some figures from official sources which will throw light upon this branch of the inquiry.

Next to Texas comes Tennessee, a State of such varied resources and conditions that in order to find materials adapted to the end in view the Speaker was obliged to select a district that furnished the required surroundings, and it was found not among the hills rich with minerals with which Providence has blest that growing commonwealth—not in the new Tennessee, but in the old, where manufactures have obtained no foothold, and where diversified industries have no existence.

Arkansas was the next State which the Speaker thought was entitled to a position of power over questions affecting the whole country. She has within her borders untold material resources. Her coal fields and her forests, her rich ores and her richer soil, adapted to the culture of wheat, cotton, and sugar, will, under an enlightenment of her people, which can not long be delayed, lead her forth and cause her to shine with all the vigor of a new life, a peer among the grand States of this Union. But as yet she sleepeth. On the rich bottom-lands of the Arkansas and White Rivers cotton is still raised with success, even in the slip-shod way peculiar to that region, but no diversity of production exists there. Here it was that a representative was found having the business experience of a cotton-planter, and he is the third on the committee we are analyzing. In all candor I submit that such experience does not and can not fit any one to act on the Ways and Means Committee for the advancement of the industrial interests of the entire country.

But let us go further in our work of analyzing this committee. Kentucky has the fourth place, a State which furnished to the councils of the nation the most gifted statesman the South has produced since the days of Thomas Jefferson, a man whose noblest instincts and early public efforts were in favor of the emancipation of the slave, and whose power in controlling national legislation and Southern sentiment was overthrown only because the interests of slavery demanded free-trade instead of the American system of protection, for which he labored. I mean Henry Clay. I know, alas, too well how that great man yielded his convictions that he might gain the Presidency, and how he failed in reaching the goal of his ambition; but, sir, had he been content to stand firmly by freedom and protection, what greatness and what glory would have been her's to-day?

Such a lead must have been followed by State after State, until the whole South by peaceful and proper means would have become free; preparation for freedom and citizenship would have been secured to the negro in a manner which to enforced abolition was impossible. We should have had no internecine war with its immense cost in blood and treasure; and being one in sentiment, one in purpose, what imagination can portray the greatness and grandeur the Union would have achieved when the first centennial of its existence was reached.

But, sir, it did not so occur; the doctrines of free trade based upon the heresy of slave-labor were too subtle to be withstood. Calhounism became the doctrine of the South and of Kentucky, and behold the result. Unsurpassed in the salubrity of her climate, the fertility of her soil, the beauty of her scenery, the richness of her hills in mineral wealth, abundantly supplied with natural waterways adapted to cheap transportation, yet, with all these advantages, that State has fallen back, back, until she is as far behind her younger and naturally no better sister States in material progress as is the accomplished member from the Lexington district behind what he would be if he were to-day advocating the doctrines of protection, so ably maintained by his predecessor, Henry Clay.

But, sir, I venture to suggest that the adhesion of that gentleman to the doctrines of Kentucky's idolized statesman would have unfitted him in the eye of the Speaker for a place on the Ways and Means Committee. If but one of his eloquent utterances had been for protection, the oligarchy whose mouthpiece and effective manager was chosen to name this committee would have rejected this worthy Kentucky member as totally unfit for the purposes of Democracy in 1888.

Then Georgia comes in for a position which gives her an opportunity to especially express her ideas on the economic legislation of this nation, and that State has a right to so express herself; but would it not have been eminently proper to vary somewhat the monotony which we have found to have governed the action of the Speaker thus far? And if Georgia must be represented, why not take one from that portion of the State in which her vast mineral wealth, long hidden, now begins to be brought to light by the new order which universal freedom has inaugurated therein? Why have recourse to that Congressional district where slave labor for so long a time has been used for the production of a single staple, and where diversified industry has never yet secured a foothold? I will endeavor to make the answer plain further on.

The sixth and last State out of which this committee has been formed is West Virginia, a State that in the near future will demonstrate the fact that raw material, labor, and capital will be as strongly united in interest as her citizens will be overwhelmingly in favor of protection, for even now a change of 75 votes in that Congressional district would have deprived the Speaker of an opportunity to venture quite so near the old Mason and Dixon line to find a Representative who would give his sanction to the Mills bill.

Mr. Chairman, geography is a good guide in many important investigations; a careful study of locality aids the Speaker of this House to know where he may look for those upon whose action he can depend for the execution of his purpose. Why, sir, it will not be claimed that the Democrats on this floor from the excluded States—States in which there exists a condition of things furnishing actual experimental knowledge of the effect of diversified industries on the prosperity of the people—are not the peers of their fellow Democrats on this committee.

But, sir, it seems that the qualifications required by the Speaker are not good standing in the party, not ability to legislate, not experience with the leading industries of the country, not a broad-minded purpose to have the interests of all sections fairly represented; not any of these; but his idea was this, and only this, to select a committee which, from its surroundings and antecedents, as well as from the well-known devotion of its members to the doctrines of free trade, could be trusted to frame a bill which under the pretense of standing by all productive industries would, if it became a law, deal a fatal blow to protection.

Run this list over once more and you will find that four of its members were elected as Democrats without any opposing Republican candidate, and why? Let the peculiar methods now in vogue in certain sections of this country for silencing political opposition answer. I am dealing, Mr. Chairman, with sectionalism not as its defender, but to expose the most glaring and indefensible sectionalism which the political history of this country affords. The impropriety of looking to the States named for a Ways and Means Committee is shown by the following facts, compiled from the Tenth Census reports, from which is seen the relation these States bear in the number of manufacturing establishments, capital employed, and the annual value of their products to similar industries in the country:

States.	Establishments.	Capital employed.	Number of hands.	Wages.	Product.
Texas	2,996	$9,245,561	12,159	$3,343,087	$20,719,928
Arkansas	1,202	2,953,130	4,550	925,358	6,756,150
Georgia	3,593	20,672,400	24,875	5,266,152	36,440,948
Tennessee	4,326	20,092,845	22,445	5,254,775	37,074,886

Now take six other States, but one of which has practically a representative on this committee, and see what place the census gives to them, as shown by corresponding data:

Why, Mr. Chairman, the six States selected by the Speaker have only about 19,000 establishments, while the unrepresented States have 132,000, in round numbers, and $112,000,000 of capital against $1,694,000,000, and the number of hands employed are only 115,000 against 1,663,000; wages paid $30,000,000 against more than $600,000,000. The entire product of the six States represented by the six sectional members of the committee is less than $200,000,000, and less than one-half of the same product in the State of Illinois alone. Why, Mr. Chairman, I know of a single rail mill in my own State the value of the output of which in the manufactured product for the past year amounted to $8,000,000, with a pay-roll for wages alone of nearly a quarter of a million of dollars; considerably more than that of the entire State of Arkansas. The ore used at that mill was shipped by vessel and by rail, the coke and coal consumed were mined and manufactured at a distance and transported, giving employment at the mill and at the mines and in transportation to more men than were employed in manufacturing in the entire State of Arkansas in 1880.

Mr. Chairman, I desire now to compare the two classes of States named in respect to their agricultural importance, and for that purpose I beg leave to present the following table compiled from the Tenth Census, which demonstrates that not only in manufactures, but in agriculture, the six manufacturing States I have named were entitled to a representation in the committee in the persons of some of the able Democratic Representatives from those States who are honored with seats on this floor:

Arkansas	94,443	Ohio	247,189

I repeat, sir, that none of these great manufacturing and agricultural States are represented on the Ways and Means Committee by a Democrat save Pennsylvania, and some Democrats will question whether the Keystone State is properly represented after all. To be sure, the distinguished gentleman whose name stands seventh and last on the Democratic side on the register of this committee [Mr. SCOTT] lives in one corner of that great Commonwealth, but this fact does not of itself show that he represents the avowed sentiments of the people of his own State on the question of protection. It must be conceded, however, that his impress has been made on the Mills bill, for he is one of the largest owners and operators in soft coal in the United States, and yet that wonderful document appears to leave the duty on soft coal unchanged.

Again, Mr. Chairman, the Democrats on this committee, with but two exceptions, were supporters of the lost cause; they were Confederates, and several of them officers in the rebel army. That army took the field for the purpose of establishing a government as different from our own in its primal doctrines and purposes as the Stars and Stripes differ from the Confederate flag. Their plan was to make human slavery the corner-stone of their political system, the central idea being that slavery furnishes the best and most desirable labor system possible. For a half century they had used their utmost endeavor to secure the adoption of that idea by this Government, and because a majority of the people clung to the Declaration of Independence and to the Constitution and would not accept the hideous doctrines of the slave power, they resorted to open rebellion. They adopted the principle that no branch of industry should be protected for the plain reason that their laborers being slaves would have no laborers to protect. Their constitution declared among other things:

SEC. 8. Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises for a revenue necessary to pay the debts, provide for the common defense, and carry on the government of the Confederate States; but no bounties shall be granted from the Treasury, nor shall any duties or taxes on importations from foreign nations be laid to promote or foster any branch of industry.

Such a constitutional provision as this demonstrates the sagacity and ability of the men who sought to erect a state on the idea that the workingmen should be the property of the owner of the soil and of the capitalist. It unquestionably meets the wants of such a government but it was rejected by the framers of our own Constitution as totally unsuited to "a government of, and for, and by the people."

Since then these members have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. "They are here in the house of their fathers, and intend to stay." They acknowledge that in the war they were overborne and obliged to lay down their arms, but they do not confess that they were wrong; on the contrary, they still insist that they were right on principle, and they are now advocates of the same political ideas they then put forth on economic questions.

Mr. Chairman, such is the record, fairly stated, of the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, and who by their unprecedented course towards the minority constituted themselves the entire committee; and in concluding what I have to say respecting it I submit that it would be unreasonable to expect from such a source a bill that ought to command the support of this House or the approval of the country.

THE STATUS OF THE FREEDMEN.

Mr. Chairman, the true inwardness and real purpose of those who are responsible for the present endeavor to break down protection can not be fully understood without considering the status of the negro, by whose muscle the labor of the South has been and in the main must be performed. True, he is no longer a chattel; he can not be put on the auction block as of old, but he is not regarded as a free man of right ought to be. His former owner finds by experience that the labor of the negro free is more valuable than was the labor of the negro slave, and for that, if for no other reason, there is no wish or purpose to re-enslave him; but it does not yet enter into the average Southern mind that the negro must become educated and must be protected in all of his civil rights; in short, a fellow-citizen equal with themselves, in order to enable the South to reach the material prosperity to which its natural resources entitle it.

Those who control the politics of the South do not as a whole desire that the colored man shall become educated, and they do not intend to permit him to enjoy or exercise the rights of a citizen, such as the amendments to the Constitution of the United States have vouchsafed to him. They do not think that it is proper to have the negro advance a single step beyond the condition of an unowned slave, and in that condition the people of the old planting States of the South still propose to have their laborers remain.

In those States where colored men are most numerous they are not heartily accorded their civil rights; they are tolerated rather in their quasi condition of freedmen for the cheap labor they furnish and for the political power their enumeration unjustly confers upon their old owners. I say unjustly, for by force and fraud the colored citizen is deprived of his vote, and yet that very citizenship goes to increase a representation which on this floor is employed to deprive the negro laborer and all other laborers of the protection to which they are entitled.

the principle of protection to American labor is the belief that just in proportion as the wonderful resources of the South come to be developed under the new era now dawning upon her, will education take the place of illiteracy, the recognition of all the civil rights of the negro take the place of their denial, which to-day is unblushingly practiced in the old planting States. What the South most needs is the development of her material resources, and this can only be secured by diversified industries, by manufactures wherewith to employ labor.

The negro is the laborer of the South, and no man will ever take his place. He is there "in the house of his fathers" eight millions strong, and he is there to stay. He must be educated in order to become a profitable laborer and a good citizen. He must be elevated from the low condition compatible with the plantation drudge to that higher state in which his naturally bright mental qualities can be brought out by actual endeavor and thought-inspiring work. In this new field the negro will vindicate his claim to manhood, and will by his own advancement secure the admiration of his fellow-men, and when this is done he will be as secure in the enjoyment of his citizenship as any one anywhere. Free trade will never bring to the South that happy day, but with protection it can not be long delayed.

If you will insist that the public debt can not be paid except at a high premium, and therefore taxation should be reduced, let it be done by taking off the enormous tax on sugar, and by removing internal-revenue taxation, so that the principle of protection to our industries may be preserved, and for that end give to the sugar industry a bounty to encourage to the utmost its production on our own soil. No doubt the tariff needs revision to remove inequalities and to simplify collection laws. Let that be done, and done by the friends and not by the enemies of protection. But, Mr. Chairman, this is not the object of the bill before us nor of the party in power.

Sir, a fair adjustment is not the question before us. It is,

WHICH IS RIGHT, FREE TRADE OR PROTECTION?

They say free trade is right on principle, and they consent to violate that principle and adopt a wrong one far enough to collect the taxes required to defray the expenses of the Government economically administered.

It is difficult to find anywhere as much folly and political wickedness crowded into so few lines as this proposition contains. If absolute free trade between this country and foreign nations is right, why not adopt it and collect the taxes directly from the people, for whose benefit Government exists? Collect from property and accumulated wealth what it costs Government to protect them and from the individual what it costs to protect his life and liberty. That would be fair and honest; but to place all the burden of supporting the Government on those who consume manufactured goods and the necessaries of life and let accumulated wealth in the form of either property or money go free is rank injustice.

I am for protection for the sake of protection, and not for revenue. If there be no better reason for maintaining duties on foreign goods than that it furnishes the best mode for raising revenue, then I will be against it. That method of taxation can not be defended standing by itself; with no compensating facts to sustain its equity, it is totally indefensible. I know it is justified on the ground of the ease with which the tax is collected when the tax-payer is not aware of the exaction, but I submit that such an argument is unworthy of intelligent men.

I am for protection because it surrounds the laboring man with conditions which secure to him employment at a rate of wages which enables him to pay the taxes imposed on the articles he consumes and then have more left to sustain himself and his family than he could possibly have on the other plan. I am for protection because it is the only way in which we can develop our own resources as a nation, employ our own muscle, our own machinery, our own brains, and our own capital, and in which these forces can work together in the most successful manner to promote the advancement of our own country. I am for my own country, and for the people of my own country, against the world.

But you say we propose to dispense with foreign trade. We have never failed to have commercial intercourse with the nations of the earth, and we propose to enlarge that intercourse; but not by reducing wages, and in this we radically differ from the advocates of free trade. They would follow in the footsteps of monarchies and extend commerce by reducing the condition of the employé to the level of the laborers of the Old World. This we will never do.

And now comes President Cleveland and tells us—

> That the plain effect of our tariff laws is to raise the price to consumers of all articles imported and subject to duty by precisely the sum paid for such duties, and that millions of our people purchase and use things of the same kind made in this country, and pay therefor nearly or quite the enhanced price which the duty adds to the imported articles.

This is a grave charge that the President has put in his message, and inasmuch as the duties on foreign importations average over 40 per cent., if the charge is true an awful burthen of taxation is laid on consumers which ought at once to be removed. But is it true? Or is it only the President's theory unsustained by facts, as the conditions which confront us when examined will abundantly prove?

This theory has been so many times disproved and shown to be utterly groundless by exhibitions of the prices at which our manufactories produce the goods consumed by our people that to repeat them would be useless. But, inasmuch as the President makes a special effort to convince the farmer and agriculturist that he is imposed upon and fearfully injured by protection, I will be pardoned for a single attempt to nail the false theory he seems so anxious to have believed like base coin.

Farmers use cut nails. In the year 1887 we made in this country 6,908,870 kegs of these useful articles of 100 pounds to the keg. The gross price of iron nails on the 16th of April last at Pittsburgh was $1.90 per keg. The duty imposed by the existing tariff on cut nails is 1½ cents per pound. Now, if the President is correct, the people of the United States paid $8,646,087.50 more for nails alone than they could have purchased them for, but for the "vicious and illogical" tariff. And it follows also that the same nails could have been bought in New York from English or Belgian nail-makers at 65 cents per keg of 100 pounds.

Mr. Chairman, there is not a Democrat in my Congressional district that believes the President is right. He may think he is honest possibly, but he will tell you the Chief Executive of this great nation has got beyond his depth and is dealing in theories that he does not comprehend. The logic is all on his side, but where are the facts? There is something in this protection business that is hard for a theoretical free-trader to understand, something "that giveth and yet increaseth."

Mr. Chairman, when a mere lad I stood in front of a country store in Ohio and saw a six-horse team, such as Thomas Corwin so graphically described, come lumbering up the road with its broad-tired wheels and its wagon-bed with heavy bows covered with linen that was spun and woven by hand. It was laden with 5 tons of merchandise, not a box or bale or cask of which had changed its place in that wagon since it was loaded in Chestnut street, Philadelphia. How many weary weeks had been consumed in the journey over the Alleghanies I do not know, but I learned since then that freight paid by the pioneer merchant in Ohio on that load of goods was $6 per 100 pounds. About that time the State of Pennsylvania proceeded to build a canal to the West for the purpose of cheapening transportation and extending the commerce of her metropolis.

The farmers and teamsters of that State, many of them, were decidedly opposed to such a scheme. They were logicians like our President, and they demonstrated (to themselves) that when a canal-boat laden with 80 tons of freight could be hauled by a single mule, when it required sixteen six-horse teams to do the same work, the teamster's occupation would be gone, the farmers would no longer have a market for either horses or oats, and ruin was sure to come. But the canal was built and the farmer lived to see the prices of horses, oats, and farms doubled and quadrupled by the very condition from which he expected nothing but disaster. What was the matter with the Pennsylvania farmer? Mr. Chairman, it was simply this: He had never had an experience that caused him to look beyond the mere logic of the proposition to those forces and influences that were sure to come and contradict his theory, and that is what ails our President and all advocates of free trade.

But gentlemen on the other side tell us that protection does not protect the laborer. A few figures, taken from industries in my own immediate neighborhood, will show this statement to be as groundless as the one I have just discussed. I refer to coal mining, window-glass manufacturing, and bottle blowing, and give the following tables of prices paid in England, in Belgium, and in the United States. The prices paid are gathered from parties in whom I have the utmost confidence, and the figures they give are, as I personally know, exact.

COAL MINING.

Hon. Thomas Burt, M. P. for the Northumberland district in England, writing from Newcastle-upon-Tyne under date of April 23 last, gives a full account of the hours of labor and wages of the employés engaged in coal mining in that district, from which the following statement is made and the earnings of employés tabulated:

> The hours of adults in the coal mines of Northumberland vary from seven to ten, from the time they leave the surface till they return, or, to quote the words of the act, "from bank to bank." The coal-hewers—who are the great majority of the workmen—are employed about seven hours. The hewers' work is exceedingly hard, and any one who has done it or seen it done,

WILL THINK THE HOURS LONG ENOUGH.

> Deputies, stone-men, shifters, and laborers generally work eight hours a day. In some cases rolley-way men and others employed in the transit of coal work ten hours a day. This longer period, however, applies only to comparatively few underground workers. Banksmen, screeners, and other persons employed on or about the pit-head usually work ten hours, and in some few cases eleven hours per day.
> Having given the hours of labor, I proceed to state the rate of wages paid at the present time. Trappers, per day, 1s.; drivers, 1s. 2d.; putters are paid by the piece or score, and their average earnings are 2s. 9½d. per day. In the case of adults the following wages are paid: Coal-hewers average, 4s. 7d. per day; stone men, about 4s.; deputies, 4s. 3½d.; shifters, 3s. Officials are paid as follows: Overmen, £2; back-overmen, master shifters, and master wastemen, 22s. per week.

The earnings above stated, compared with wages paid for similar service in coal-mines of my district, are as follows:

Employés.		Northumberland.	Illinois.
Trappers	per day	$0.24	$0.75 to $0.90
Drivers	do	.28	1.25 to 2.25
Putters	do	.67	1.25 to 2.25
Coal-hewers (miners) while employed	do	1.10	*1.25
Stone-men	do	.96	2.00 to 2.25
Shifters	do	.72	1.50 to 2.25
Overmen	per month	40.00	1.60 to 1.50
Deputy overmen	do	31.50	65.00

*Year round.

Now, take the window-glass and glass-bottle industries, both of which have obtained a foothold in my own neighborhood, and compare the wages paid in the State of Illinois with the wages paid for same service performed in foreign countries:

Table of wages paid for making window-glass in Belgium and Illinois.

Employés.		Belgium.	Pittsburgh and the West.
Blowers	per month	*$75.00	$125.00 to $150.00
Gatherers	do	*25.00	70.00 to 90.00
Flatteners	do	*25.00	100.00 to 140.00
Assistant flatteners	do	*12.00	45.00
Cutters	do	25.00	90.00 to 130.00
Master shearers	do	30.00	90.00
Shearers	do	15.00	45.00
Pot-makers	do		90.00
Laborers	do		35.00 to 40.00

*About.

Some blowers will make much more than the amount stated, but that is exceptional.

The wages in Belgium are for much longer hours and a greater number of days per annum. The workmen in the United States have averaged only about thirty-two weeks per year since 1883.

Next comes bottle-making. In Belgium and England first-class bottle-blowers get from $1.60 to $1.75 per day, while the earnings of the same class of workmen in Illinois amount to from $5.50 to $6 per day. Laborers of various kinds around bottle-works in Belgium and England get from 40 to 50 cents per day, while the same laborers in Illinois ar paid from $1.75 to $2.50. These figures tell the story.

WHO ASKS FOR A CHANGE?

Mr. Chairman, who has petitioned Congress for the removal of duties on imported goods? Have mechanics or laboring men, manufacturers or operatives, mill-owners or workers in mills, mine-owners or miners, petitioned for a reduction of the tariff? How many agriculturists have asked for the passage of the Mills bill? There has been next to no demand for tariff reduction from the people of the United States. England and the Democratic party on this floor alone seem to be in a praying mood for the reduction of tariff rates. Has anybody save distillers asked that the internal-revenue tax on whisky should remain undisturbed? On the other hand, is it not true that two hundred thousand of as good and as earnest men and women as inhabit the several States have asked for the removal of that tax, knowing that it enables the producers of alcoholic drinks to wield their questionable business so as to make immense profits and at the same time create a political power which no other combine in the country can equal, not a jot or tittle of which is withheld from the Democratic party on election day in every town, city, or hamlet in this broad land?

Mr. Chairman, for one I am ready to repeal the internal-revenue tax on spirits, and in that way to reduce the surplus and break up the great whisky trust, for I think that rich and powerful combination, which now not only manufactures whisky, but builds its saloons and hires its bartenders in every place desirable for their nefarious business where the law permits, would fall to pieces in a single year after the repeal of the Government tax on whisky. I am not seeking for a way to promote the rum traffic; I am not anxious to lighten the burden of the rum-seller. In any municipality where public sentiment practically fails to prohibit the sale of intoxicants as a beverage, let the highest possible tax be levied on the retailer for the sole benefit of the tax-payer in those counties where the immense cost of the crime they cause to be committed has to be borne.

I pity the man who can look with indifference on that great destroyer of life, happiness, property, and good morals, dram drinking, which lays a heavy hand on the happiness and prosperity of the laboring men of this country. Of the nine hundred millions annually expended for drink it is safe to presume that one-half of it is taken from the pockets of laboring men, and for this vast contribution there comes no return but misery and crime. How many snug homes, filled with such comforts and delights as the human heart craves, would this worse than wasted sum bring to the family, making the light of hope and love to shine where now the thick darkness of despair so often casts its baneful shadow. Sir, show to me that by my voice or vote I can even restrain this great evil in a practical way, and that voice and vote will not be wanting.

Talk of trusts; there is the Cotton-seed oil trust, the Standard Oil trust, and transportation combines, not one of which has any relation to tariff protection, but greater and more powerful than any in this country is the whisky trust. It and the Democratic party are one in interest—they are united in life, and in death they will not be divided. The internal-revenue tax on whisky will not be disturbed by Democratic votes, for this tax is the umbilical cord that insures the existence of both. It signifies its wish that the tax on whisky shall remain undisturbed, and the ready response of the President is, your wishes shall be gratified whatever may be the effect on the manufacturing interests of the nation that need protecting; and the Speaker, more than ready to sustain such a policy, so frames the committee that whisky is safe.

NATURE OF THE CONFLICT.

Mr. Chairman, the political conflict in which we are now engaged is the addenda to the late conflict of arms, and it has not come an hour too soon. The issue is made so clear by the action of the President that the disguises of this bill are of but little account. Free Trade vs. Protection is the title of the cause now on trial before the American people, and upon which we as jurors will in a few days be compelled to vote. That such is its true character is understood both by the workingmen of America and the manufacturers of England. In proof of this I beg leave to insert here a copy of a preamble and resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of workingmen held at Cooper Union, New York, on the 8th instant, which reads as follows:

Whereas the so-called Mills tariff bill, now under discussion in the House of Representatives, by placing on the free-list many articles that come into competition with the products of American labor, and by sweeping reductions in the duties upon others, menaces the ruin of many of our industries, and would, if enacted into a law, entail great loss of employment and widespread suffering among working people; and

Whereas the workingmen of this country have been contemptuously denied a hearing by the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, which framed the bill; and

Whereas it is now apparent to every workingman that the prevailing agitation of the tariff question and the proposed reduction of duties are destroying confidence in business, reducing wages in some occupations and stopping altogether the wages in others:

Therefore, we, the workingmen of the city of New York, in mass meeting assembled, earnestly protesting against the passage of the Mills tariff bill and against any and all measures of a similar character which threaten the labor and industry of our country and propose to lower the American standard of wages, do hereby declare and proclaim the following resolutions:

Resolved, That we demand, of the Representatives in Congress from this city that they not only vote against this most recent attack on the prosperity of American labor, but that they use their utmost endeavors to secure its defeat.

Resolved, That we protest against a bill which puts raw material on the free-list when that so-called raw material is the product of American labor.

Resolved, That we protest against a bill which would break down the barrier which defends American labor from competition with the pauper labor of Europe and Asia, and aims to reduce our families to the foreign level of cheapness and poverty.

Resolved, That we demand that the internal-revenue war taxes be repealed, and that protection to American labor be maintained and made more effective.

Resolved, That we call upon our fellow-workingmen in all parts of the land to rise up and denounce the Mills tariff bill as a menace to our welfare and to our rights as citizens, which threatens to deprive us of the opportunities of education afforded by the American system of high wages, and we denounce as a fraud the free-trade argument that the cost of living in this country is increased in proportion to the rates of duty on imports, except as we choose and are able to live better here than our unfortunate rivals in foreign countries.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to the President and to every member of Congress.

And should any doubt exist in any mind as to how the manufacturers of England regard this movement, it would be dispelled by the following, from the London Saturday Review, which is only one out of twenty English editorials on the subject which are of similar import. It says that the message deals with a question which is as interesting to Englishmen as Americans, and it adds:

President Cleveland has devoted himself entirely to the tariff. It is impossible to recast this without touching directly the pockets of every citizen of the United States and indirectly influencing the commercial interests of the world. The President and the Democratic leaders have finally decided that they have nothing to gain by keeping measure any longer with the protectionists. They have, from whatever motive, resolved to adopt the free-trade policy. Nothing can be more explicit than the President's language. "The simple and plain duty which we owe the people is to reduce taxation to the necessary expenses of an economical operation of the Government, and to restore to the business of the country the money which we hold in the Treasury." In America this means free trade.

Mr. Chairman, whatever may be the decision of Congress on this question, it will be reviewed by the court of last resort in this country, the citizen, whose scepter of power is a free ballot, and to that grandest tribunal on earth this case must be submitted; and for one I can not doubt as to what the verdict will be. The good sense of the American people has never been appealed to in vain; their instinctive tendency is to right action, and whenever occasion calls for their serious thought an expression of their judgment has thus far proven to be indeed the voice of God. Mr. Chairman, in dignity and independence there is no sovereign on earth who can compare with the intelligent, independent, and fearless citizen of the United States who does not hold an office and who aspires to none. Such a one is without a peer, except it be his fellow-citizen in like condition. To such the destiny of the Republic is committed, and the first century of matchless progress through which they have conducted it justifies the faith that centuries to come will add to its glory and renown.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, the President in his recent message apprised Congress that the proceeds of surplus taxation in the Treasury by June 30, the end of the current fiscal year, may be expected to reach the sum of $140,000,000, including prior accumulations, or, more closely stated, the sum of one hundred and thirteen millions, apart from prior accumulations, over and above all authorized expenses, including the sinking fund for the current fiscal year. In reference to this condition, he proceeds:

Our scheme of taxation, by means of which this needless surplus is taken from the people and put into the public Treasury, consists of a tariff or duty levied upon importations from abroad, and internal-revenue taxes levied upon the consumption of tobacco and spirituous and malt liquors. It must be conceded that none of the things subjected to internal-revenue taxation are, strictly speaking, necessaries. There appears to be no just complaint of this taxation by the consumers of these articles, and there seems to be nothing so well able to bear the burden without hardship to any portion of the people.

But our present tariff laws, the vicious, inequitable, and illogical source of unnecessary taxation, ought to be at once revised and amended. These laws, as their primary and plain effect, raise the price to consumers of all articles imported and subject to duty by precisely the sum paid for such duties. Thus the amount of the duty measures the tax paid by those who purchase for use these imported articles.

From this utterance I understand the President to be averse to any reduction in internal taxation, as that mode of taxation affords, as he says, "no just complaint," and that "nothing is so well able to bear the burdens without hardship to any portion of the people." He further says our tariff laws are "the vicious, inequitable, and illogical source of unnecessary taxation," and "ought to be at once revised and amended," and with intent "to enforce an earnest recommendation that the surplus revenues of the Government be prevented by the reduction of our customs duties," he urged upon Congress "immediate consideration" of these matters to the exclusion of all others.

These are distinct declarations and not susceptible of doubtful construction. In substance it is asserted that the reductions necessary should be made through the means of additions to the free-list and lower rates of duty on importations.

In the presence of such language, emanating from the Executive, authorized by direction of the Constitution to communicate and—from time to time give to Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient—

it is the imperative requirement of the representatives of the people of the United States to give fair, intelligent, and prompt attention to the suggestions made. I have done so, and as a remedy for the evils pictured, I introduced and had referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, on March 12 last, a bill—to reduce and equalize duties on imports, to reduce internal-revenue taxes, and for other purposes.

An examination of the provisions of the bill mentioned shows the remedies I would apply are at variance with those recommended by the President. He seeks to prevent the continuance of surplus revenue by a resort to changes in our customs duties only. The remedy I propose is through a repeal of internal-revenue taxes as well as by a full revision of the tariff, as promised to the people by the Democratic convention which assembled in Chicago in 1884.

The reductions provided for in the bill alluded to would aggregate on internal taxation about $70,000,000. It repeals the entire internal tax on tobacco and fruit brandies; it repeals the license tax on wholesale and retail dealers, leaving these for such control by State authority as the respective States may see fit; it makes all alcohol used in the arts and manufactures free, and reduces the tax on whisky to 50 cents per gallon.

These taxes have always been the last to be levied and the first to be repealed when no longer needed. It was the boast of Jefferson that he had given the death-blow to the excise tax, "that most vexatious of all taxes," at the commencement of his administration; and among other things for which he received the thanks of the Legislature of his native State on his retirement from office was for "internal taxes abolished."

The first tax also to be repealed after the war of 1812 was the excise tax, which was recommended by Madison, and was the first law enacted under the administration of Monroe.

The Democratic convention of 1884 declared that "the system of direct taxation known as the internal revenue is a 'war tax,'" and this declaration, taken in connection with other declarations in the platform which I will quote further on, clearly establishes the fact that the opinion of the convention was that the internal-revenue "war" taxes should first go, and should all go whenever a sufficient sum was realized from custom-house taxes to meet the expenses of the Government, economically administered. We are practically in such condition now, and a true response to these instructions warrants the repeal of the internal laws to the extent the bill proposes.

I favor now, as I have always done, a total repeal of the internal-revenue taxation. [Applause.] In the bill which I introduced I proposed to sweep all these taxes off the statute-book except 50 cents on whisky, and I would transfer the collection of that tax to the customs officials, if upon examination and reflection it was found to be practicable.

Some of the reasons which induced me to form this judgment and now to adhere to this course I can not better state than by a repetition of some of my former expressions in this connection:

With Albert Gallatin I have regarded the excise or internal-revenue taxes as offensive to the genius of our people, and tolerated by the framers of the Constitution only as a measure of necessity in the emergency of war, and that just so soon as the occasion for them had passed away they should cease to exist. He and Thomas Jefferson, as the very first act of Jefferson's administration, secured a repeal of internal taxes and relieved the people from their inequality, inquisitorial annoyances, and hordes of officials clothed with dangerous powers. Only in these latter days have I heard men calmly claim these war taxes are still necessary—a generation after the war which gave rise to them had closed. And it is a very suggestive and suspicious feature of the affair that those upon whom the tax is laid clamor loudly against its being taken off, regarding it no doubt as a protection against competition to the large monopolies.

To substantiate the ground taken by me in that letter, I will refer to two authorities. I will read first from Blackstone's Commentaries (book 1, pages 317, 318) to show excise is a war tax:

But at the same time the rigor and arbitrary proceedings of excise laws seem hardly compatible with the temper of a free nation. For the frauds that might be committed in this branch of the revenue, unless a strict watch is kept, make it necessary, wherever it is established, to give the officers the power of entering and searching the houses of such as deal in excisable commodities at any hour of the day, and, in many cases, of the night likewise. And the proceedings in cases of transgression are summary and sudden.

However, its "original establishment was in 1643, and its progress was gradual both sides protesting it should continue no longer than to the end of the war, and then be utterly abolished. * * * But from its first origin to the present time its very name has been odious to the people of England." It has been kept up, however, to supply the enormous sums necessary to carry on the continental wars of Europe.

So believed Jefferson; and let us next see what he did. I read from Schouler's History of the United States, volume 2, page 21:

In economy and retrenchment the President had already made a beginning by reducing the diplomatic establishment and consolidating some revenue offices subject to executive control. The movement now contemplated was to abolish that whole system of internal taxation, which he had heartily detested as tyrannous, burdensome, and liable to abuse of patronage; which had always been unpopular in the Middle and Southern country, and which cost more than the first three years' net produce to put down resistance to its collection. But excise receipts had risen gradually to the neighborhood of $1,000,000, and many feared that the Treasury would suffer if this resource was suddenly cut off. Jefferson had, however, gone over the ground carefully with Secretary Gallatin; against the present yield of the internal taxes they set off what the Government might safely economize elsewhere.

Customs duties alone would, as they correctly surmised, supply a revenue sufficient to support the Federal establishment, and, besides paying interest on the public debt, extinguish its principal, should peace continue, in fifteen or eighteen years. Federalists were incredulous, and those with friends in place tried to induce a repeal, only partial at most, but the ax was laid to the root, and with the downfall of this system went about half the offices at the disposal of the Administration.

In addition I then said and now repeat that if this internal-revenue system were abolished to-day we would have no surplus revenue to scare us, while the administration of public affairs would be rendered purer and better.

On the tariff the bill embraces a revision of the entire system on principles believed to be in harmony with the last authoritative declaration of the Democratic party, from which I quote, as follows:

From the foundation of this Government taxes collected at the custom-house have been the chief source of the Federal revenue. Such they must continue to be.

All taxation should be limited to the requirements of economical government. The necessary reduction in taxation can and must be effected without depriving American labor of the ability to compete successfully with foreign labor and without imposing lower rates of duty than will be ample to cover any increased cost of production which may exist in consequence of the higher rate of wages existing in this country.

This declaration of principles clearly recognizes the fact that a difference exists in the cost of the production of commodities in this and other countries in consequence of the higher rate of wages existing in this country, and declares for duties ample to cover this difference.

This is the cardinal principle that must govern in any intelligent revision of our tariff. Our industrial system differs from that of any other country in the important fact that labor in this country receives a much larger share of what is annually produced than in any other. It is believed to be demonstrable that this advantage to labor can be maintained only by giving to our industries protection equal to the difference. Whether this difference be expressed by wages or by what wages will command for wage-earners, does not matter in the final analysis. The question is, what proportion of the annual products of labor and capital combinded does labor receive, and how much larger is that proportion in our system than in any other? It may not be possible to state exactly this difference, but statistics are abundant enough to prove that the difference is largely in favor of American labor. No one will deny that an industrial system under which annual products are most widely distributed and in which labor receives as its share a larger proportion is the better system.

As the name of Edward Atkinson has been referred to in this debate, publishing his opinion which was given a long while ago, let us see how he speaks of recent events in his late article on "Low prices, high wages, small profits; what makes them?" He says that—

Since the end of the civil war, in 1865, and yet more since the so-called panic of 1873, there has been greater progress in common welfare among the people of this country than ever before. It has been the period in which there has been the greatest application of science and invention to the production and distribution of food that ever occurred in any single generation in the history of this or any other country; and food is the prime necessity of material life. * * * The cost of the material for food, of materials for clothing, boots, and shoes, and of fuel, probably represents about 70 per cent. of the cost of living on the part of well-to-do mechanics, railway employés, or of other persons in analogous occupations who may be considered in the average position of working people. All these elements of life have declined very greatly in their prices in the period under consideration. * * * Some one has wisely and wittily said that "It does not much matter what happens to the millionaire; how is it with the million?"

If it shall appear that out of this great reduction in prices the millions have gained higher wages; that hundreds of thousands of families have gained better homes and greater comfort in life; while those who have suffered temporary loss have been only the rich who have been incapable of adjusting themselves to the new conditions, or the unskilled poor who have been unable to grasp the greater opportunities for welfare which invention has offered them, then may we not come to the conclusion that diminished profits and low prices are merely the complement of higher wages and lower cost, and are therefore most certain indications of general progress from poverty to welfare, yet still leaving the problem open, how to help the unskilled poor?

This would seem to settle the question as to whether we should adhere to the beneficent policy pursued of encouraging and protecting our own home manufactures by the protection which necessarily results from any proper adjustment of duties in any tariff bill for the purpose of raising revenue to carry on the Government economically administered. It demonstrates unmistakably the truth of what those who agree with me have contended would be the result. To increase wages products must be increased, for in the end wages are but the laborers' share of products. While a dollar may buy more in another country than here, a day's labor, which is the crucial test, will exchange for more of the necessaries and comforts of life here than anywhere else. [Applause.]

Under free trade this advantage which accrues to labor would disappear. It is impossible that it should be otherwise; for if a tariff does not in itself give higher wages to labor, it does preserve from destructive competition a system in which labor can and does receive as its reward better wages or a larger share of the fruits of its own toil than in any other system. No two industrial systems side by side, with labor in one receiving double the wages of labor in the other, could long exist under free trade between them. Too much stress can not be laid upon such facts as these, because on them hinges the necessity of protecting American industries, in order to preserve the advantages to labor that have arisen under them; and who would wish to see that system overthrown and reconstructed on the basis of other countries, with labor kept at the level of a bare existence, and with no hope of ever bettering that condition?

Before proceeding to explain the principles and provisions of the bill which I introduced, as it affects the tariff, I will stop to refer to a few of the fundamental propositions which have been persistently maintained throughout this debate, and which appear to exercise a controlling influence over the opinions of so many.

First. That duties are always added to the price which the consumer must pay.

On articles not produced in this country this is doubtlessly true, as a general rule, and measurably true also on articles in part produced in this country but not sufficient to supply the entire demand. But on all those commodities produced in sufficient abundance to supply, or measurably supply the home market, different principles control. In that case competition, where it is free to operate, determines the prices of the various products and the foreign producer comes to this as a market where prices are fixed, and the duties are what he pays for the privilege of entering our market. [Applause.]

Another erroneous proposition is that duties on articles produced in this country are a tax or bounty which the consumer pays to the manufacturer, by means of which the manufacturer derives larger profits than prevail in other industries.

If this were true it is not easy to see what justification could be offered for the committee bill any more than for the present tariff laws. But that this, as a general rule, is erroneous becomes apparent enough on a closer examination of the laws of trade which prevail under all systems.

That there is a tendency in every industrial system to an equalization of profits on capital and wages of labor is an admitted principle of political economy. Adam Smith long ago laid down the proposition that larger profits in one industry than in others could not long prevail in the same country. Other economists state the same principle. Suppose that, with our industries constituted as they are, we formed a world by ourselves, would it be claimed that one class, as consumers, paid a perpetual tax to another class, as producers? Would not rather the economic law just stated prevail? Such would be the condition, too, under a tariff entirely prohibitory. The same law, too, operates under a tariff that covers the difference in the cost of production between this and other countries.

Of course the tendency to an equalization of profits on capital and wages of labor never reaches a dead-level, because of the varying conditions and influences under which production and consumption go on.

From these principles it follows that all who participate in an industrial system are partakers of its benefits, whether they are employed in one industry or another—not the manufacturer alone, but the laborer; in short, all who produce and exchange products are alike benefited under this system, and that is the system we seek to continue by a proper adjustment of tariff duties. Only those who have fixed incomes or are in office for life with fixed salaries, would be benefited by the overthrow of this system and the establishment of free trade. But this is the last class that has a right to complain.

Still another assumption is that any class of producers—for instance, the agricultural class or the wage-earners—could continue indefinitely to sell their products, or their services, in our present higher market, and at the same time buy the products or the services of others in cheaper markets. That this is not possible becomes clear enough on the most casual examination. If the farmer ceases to buy the products of the manufacturers, he will certainly cease to sell to them, and must sell his products in the market where he buys what he consumes himself. Suppose last year we had manufactured a thousand millions' worth less than we did and had gone abroad for these products, expecting to pay for them with agricultural products; could a thousand millions more of agricultural products have been sold abroad at the price such products brought here? We sold all the wheat and corn and meat products that Europe would take at the prices that prevailed. Who can tell at what prices Europe would have taken even five hundred millions or one hundred millions more of our agricultural products than she did take? The mere statement of the proposition is enough to disclose the error on which it is founded, and shows the importance of uniting manufactures with agriculture, or, as Jefferson states it, put the manufacturer by the side of the farmer. In fact, both must, in our country, depend almost exclusively on our home market. It is folly, if not a crime, to attempt a change in these respects. It would bring ruin and bankruptcy without the possibility of having such a result accomplished. The greater the diversity of industries in any country, the greater the wealth-producing power of the people, and the more there is for labor and capital to divide, and the more independent that country becomes. [Applause.]

I now come to the principles on which the bill I have introduced is framed.

The bill embraces a full revision of the tariff.

It carries to the free-list many articles which enter into consumption as raw material, or otherwise, and in the production of which there is no injurious competition between this and other countries.

In fixing the tariff rates the aim has been to adjust the duties as nearly as possible to cover the difference in the cost of production in this and other countries, arising from the different conditions I have stated. This rule has been extended to all the industries embraced in our system where climatic or other causes do not put us at a disadvantage in carrying on production.

In working out the details of the bill under these principles it has been my purpose to lower the duties wherever possible and reduce the revenues.

But here we come upon principles that require careful attention. Between the extremes of free trade on the one hand and a prohibitory tariff on the other there are three principles, one or the other of which must governs in levying a tariff. First, revenue only, or an even rate of duty on all imports, just high enough to yield the revenue needed to support the Government.

Second, maximum revenue; that is, a tariff that will yield the largest possible revenue.

Third, a tariff to cover the difference in cost of production in this and other countries.

The points important to consider in connection with these principles is, that the line of "revenue only" falls below either of the others, and that the line of maximum revenue (which is the largest product resulting from multiplying the rate of duty on any article by the quantity imported) is always and necessarily below the line of difference in the cost of production. Consequently, to lower the rate of duty, until the line of maximum revenue is passed, must result in an increase of revenues and not a decrease. To reduce the rate from the line of maximum revenue down, will result, of course, in reduced revenues. On the other hand, to raise the rate until the line of maximum revenue is reached, is to increase the revenues; but from the line of maximum revenue up, an increase in the rate of duty necessarily results in reduced revenues. To ignore these principles is to act blindly, and any computations calculated to show the results of changes in the tariff that do not take these facts into account are utterly worthless.

An all-important consideration in connection with these principles, as will be seen from a close inspection, is that, in order materially to reduce revenues by reducing the rate of duties on competing industries, it is necessary to go below the maximum revenue line, that is, below the line of fair or even competition, and give the advantage to foreign manufacturers.

It is for this reason, it is believed, that the committee bill in very many cases, and especially where ad valorem duties are substituted for existing specific rates, will result in an increase rather than a decrease of the revenues.

To determine just where the line of difference in cost falls is, of course, in many instances, difficult; but it may be safely assumed, and has been adopted as a governing rule in preparing the bill I have introduced, that when the importations in any line of commodities is large and increasing from year to year (and no good reason appears why the things can not be as well produced here), that the duties are below the cost line, and that the advantage is with the foreign producer. If production in the same line is diminished, or suspended altogether, in this country, it becomes proof positive that the advantage is too great to be overcome without a readjustment of duties.

Where importations are light or not increasing, it may consistently be assumed that the duties are quite high enough and in many cases may be safely reduced; and in case the industries are of such a nature as to permit trusts or combinations of any kind to raise prices above the level of prices or profits in other industries, then it becomes important that the cost line should be closely adhered to.

It is less important, of course, to apply this rule rigidly where prices are regulated through free competition. In such cases, under the economic principles I have stated, the tendency is always to a general level in profits, wages, and prices in all industries.

And before leaving this point I wish to state distinctly that if in any case it can be made to appear that the measure I have proposed gives more protection than is needed to cover the difference in the cost of production, I am ready to lower it; on the contrary, if in any instance the rate of duty is too low to cover this difference, I am ready to help raise it; and on this principle in the bill, I have offered the duty on a few articles has been increased, as I shall later on explain.

Again, if it is made to appear that the present duties, or the rates proposed in my bill in any way are made use of, or can be, to foster monopolies, I stand ready to apply the remedy. Monopolies may and do exist, with or without the tariff. Certainly the greatest monopolies and trusts in this country now—the Standard Oil trust, the whisky trust, the cottonseed-oil trust, and others I might name, have no connection with our tariff laws. I have never advocated a tariff for the purpose of supporting monopolies, but for the protection of labor, and I am for the protection of labor, not at one stage merely, but at all stages in the production of any commodity. I am for the protection and maintenance of an industrial system that allows to labor better reward than any other. I believe such a system to be the outgrowth of our better form of government and our higher civilization, and that its overthrow will endanger the very existence of our institutions. [Applause.]

ADMINISTRATIVE FEATURES OF THE BILL, SPECIFIC DUTIES.

The late Secretary Manning signalized his administration of the Treasury Department by a more complete and thorough inquiry into the administration of the customs service than had ever been attempted by his predecessors. His annual reports for the years 1886 and 1887 on the collection of duties, his report on the revision of the tariff in February, 1886, and his various special communications to the Committees on Finance and Ways and Means of Congress, are monuments of his marvelous, effective, and conscientious labors in this regard. In all these he urged a thorough and complete revision of the tariff and the elimination of its many ambiguities, which had led to endless disputes and litigation and consequent hardships to importers and losses to all interests concerned. He urgently and repeatedly dwelt upon the necessity for the substitution of specific for ad valorem duties wherever practicable, not only in the interest of good administration, but as a guard against fraud and to protect the honest trader.

In these views respecting specific duties he was supported by the almost unanimous opinions of the leading importing merchants as well as the principal manufacturers of the country, whose testimony on the subject he transmitted to Congress with his report on the revision of the tariff.

The customs officers, charged with the immediate work of appraising imports and collecting duties, also gave emphatic and convincing testimony to the importance of the adoption of the system of specific instead of ad valorem rates.

The present Secretary of the Treasury, in an able letter to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, dated June 14, 1886, presented unanswerable arguments in favor of the application of specific duties in place of high ad valorem rates, particularly as to silks, laces, embroideries, and leather gloves.

In submitting schedules covering these articles and recommending their adoption by Congress, he said:

> Should the recommendations herein made be adopted, it is confidently believed that the greater part of the contentions constantly prevailing at the port of New York with respect to appraisements will disappear, importations by regular merchants throughout the country become general, and the full duties provided by the laws be secured at a diminished cost of collection.

In his last annual report to Congress he also used the following language:

> Whatever the rates of customs taxation may be the laws for collection of the same should be made as efficient as possible. In this the bona fide importer who wishes to gain only the legitimate profits of his business, the home manufacturer, and laborer are equally interested. They all have a right to demand that the laws be so administered as to give them every possible protection in their business. The high ad valorem tariff of the last quarter of a century has been the fruitful cause of devices to gain improper advantage at the custom-house. It is, therefore, desirable that in revising and reducing rates of duty they should be made specific instead of ad valorem so far as the nature of the merchandise will permit. Theoretically considered ad valorem are preferable to specific duties, but in practice, under such rates as we have had and must continue to have for years to come, the former are the too easy source of deception and inequality at the custom-house. Congress has it in its power to change, from time to time, as may be advisable, specific rates so as to meet any permanent changes in values.

In matters relating purely to the administration of the laws I esteem it to be the duty of Congress to consider carefully and to act upon the advice of the executive officers, who know the facts and are charged with the responsibility of the administration of the law, and in the preparation of the bill presented by me I have conformed to this view; and as a part of the work of revision of the tariff the aim has been to remove the incongruities and inequalities with which it abounds and which have been so fruitful of lawsuits and losses to the revenue and merchants, and which have been obstacles in the way of honest and orderly administration.

ADJUSTMENT OF RATES.

In adjusting the rates under the various schedules information has been sought and obtained, so far as practicable, from those having knowledge of the industries affected, and these interests have been duly considered in arranging the details of the bill.

It is estimated that the customs revenue will be reduced by this bill something over $20,000,000 per annum. These reductions are distributed throughout the various schedules, reductions being larger in some than in others.

Of all the industries in this country those deriving least direct benefit from tariff laws are the products of agriculture, and no material reduction in rates on these products has been deemed advisable. One important change proposed in one of the schedules is that imposing a specific rate of duty on animals. This, it is believed, will prove a better measure of protection to our stock-raisers and wool-growers. There has been much complaint among wool-growers over the depression in the domestic wool market since the enactment of the tariff in 1883. This depression, it is believed, is in large measure due to evasions of duty by the importation of wool tops and waste—which the bill corrects—and the discrimination in our present tariff between worsted and woolen cloths, which has well nigh driven worsted manufactures from this country. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his last annual report, refers to this interest in these words:

> A conspicuous example of the inequalities of the tariff is found in the discrimination in the rates of duty imposed on woolen and worsted cloths.

And adds:

> There is much reason to believe that the manufacture of worsted cloths must soon cease in this country unless the tariff law in this regard is amended.

Careful attention has been given in the bill to this subject, with a view to remedy the evils complained of and to restore this important industry to the United States.

The time allotted to me in this discussion will not permit detailed reference to the different schedules. This must be left to other occasions, but certain provisions in the metal schedule having been sharply assailed, I feel compelled to occupy a little time in the consideration of a few items.

THE METAL SCHEDULE.

In the metal schedule the reductions in rates apply to a majority of the articles therein enumerated, and include iron and steel rails, bar-iron, plate-iron, iron and steel fish-plates, nails and tacks, iron and steel beams, girders, and other structural iron, railway wheels, iron and steel ingots for making wheels and tires, sheet-iron, hoop-iron, anchors, tubes, axles, chains, screws, needles, horseshoes, mechanics' tools, castings, hollow-ware, copper, lead, and various other manufactures of metal. A comparison of the two bills will show that the reduction of duties extends to many more articles in this schedule than does the committee's bill. Certain articles in this schedule, namely, bronze-powder, taggers' iron, tin and terne plates, cotton-ties, iron and steel wire rods and ingots, billets, slabs, and blooms, are dutiable under the present tariff at such low rates, or at ad valorem rates which are so easily and largely evaded, that their home production is either wholly prevented or seriously restricted, so that the greater part of the revenue derived from this schedule comes from the large and constantly increasing importation of these articles.

TIN-PLATE.

Particular objection has been made to the increased rate of duty provided for in the bill introduced by me above the existing law on tin-plate. The present rate is 1 cent per pound, the proposed rate 2.10 cents per pound. This increase is necessary to secure the production of tin-plate in the United States.

At present tin-plate making is practically unknown in this country, though we are as well fitted to make it as England and Wales, from which countries most of our tin-plate come. The United States is the largest consumer of tin-plate in the world. We take nearly two-thirds of the production of Great Britain. Within six years we have paid British manufacturers over $100,000,000 for tin-plate, besides paying freight. This is too much money to send out of the country for an article which we are capable of producing at home.

The value at the port of export of the tin-plate imported during the year ending June 30, 1887, was $16,883,813. As near as I can learn, the total wages paid the British laborers in the production of the tin-plate imported into the United States last year were about $9,000,000. My wish is that such amount be expended in our own country, and that it go to our own wage-earners. The rate fixed would induce such extended manufacture, that in my judgment, by reason of competition and the law of demand and supply, the price would not be higher after twelve months than we are now paying for the same article, and would put the manufacture of tin-plate where, by proper inspection laws, it could be kept free from poisonous adulterations when manufactured for canning purposes. At the same time it would create such a demand for labor as to give employment to every idle iron and steel worker in the country, and thus enable labor to maintain a standard of wages that would secure to the workingman reasonable remuneration and a respectable livelihood. It would also give additional employment to labor in the production of coal, iron ore, coke, limestone, and other materials. There were imported into the United States about 255,000 gross tons of tin-plate in 1887, which represent 870,000 tons of iron ore, 300,000 tons of limestone, 1,800,000 tons of coal and coke, 360,000 tons of pig-iron, 5,000,000 pounds of lead, 25,000,000 pounds of tin, 12,000,000 pounds of tallow and palin oil, 35,000,000 pounds of sulphuric acid, 12,000,000 feet of lumber, and, in addition, fire-brick, clay, oil, and other lubricants, hemp, etc.

It would require sixty-eight large works of five trains of rolls each, involving an outlay of $30,000,000 capital, and employment to about 24,000 workmen, who would earn at least $12,000,000 in wages. All this would be accomplished, I believe, without the least injury, within one year to any consumer of tin-plate in the United States.

COTTON-TIES.

Cotton-ties are used chiefly for baling cotton, rags—waste, and similar articles. They are made of hoop-iron. The hoops are usually 1 inch wide by No. 18 wire gauge thick, are cut to lengths of 11 feet each, punched, have a buckle riveted or attached to them, are varnished or painted, and put into bundles of 50 pounds each.

The present rate on cotton-ties is one of the most marked inconsistencies of the tariff, as they bear a less rate of duty than the article out of which they are made.

It is plain that these cotton-ties should not only bear no less a duty than is levied on hoop-iron, of which they are made, but it is fair that they should pay an additional duty, equal to the additional labor cost. They do not now bear the hoop-iron duty, and yet it is proposed in the bill before the House to place cotton-ties on the free-list. In the act of 1883 the duty was put at 35 per cent. ad valorem, which, on the invoice price, is equal to a duty of four-tenths of a cent a pound, while No. 18 hoop-iron, 1 inch wide, bears a duty of 1.2 cents per pound. It is thus seen that cotton-ties pay, under the existing law, but one-third the duty on the articles from which they are made. This is a positive discrimination against the home manufacturer in favor of the foreign producer and shipper, and the foreigner to-day controls the market in this country. In 1887 the average invoice value per pound of cotton-ties imported was 1⅔ cents. The average invoice value of hoop-iron not thinner than No. 20, imported, was 2½ cents per pound. In other words, the cotton-ties made out of 1 and No. 18 hoop were invoiced at about one-half the invoice price of the hoop-iron out of which they were made. The invoices on cotton-ties are undervaluations, of course, and the injury done to the American manufacturers is greatly aggravated by the application of an ad valorem duty, a system which gives most protection where least is needed and the least protection where most is needed. In a word, permits the foreign manufacturer and the American importer to fix the rates of duty on imports, and not those who administer our tariff laws.

The placing of cotton-ties on the free-list prevents any hope of their production in the United States, for the rate of wages for rolling and heating a ton of cotton-ties in England is $2.31; in Pittsburgh, $4.10, nearly double, and so on all through. The cotton-growers of the cotton belt do not suffer in any way as regards the price of cotton-ties. They sell their entire bales, including bagging and iron, at cotton rates, and no tare is charged in this country and the charge abroad is borne by the shipper. There is no reason or equity in the proposition to place this article on the free-list.

WIRE RODS, ETC.

The clause in the present tariff as to wire rods reads as follows:

Iron or steel rivet, screw, nail, and fence, wire rods, round, in coils and loops, not lighter than No. 5 wire gauge, valued at 3½ cents or less per pound, six-tenths of 1 cent per pound. Iron or steel, flat, with longitudinal ribs, for the manufacture of fencing, six-tenths of a cent per pound.

In the bill which I introduced limitation to sizes smaller than No. 5 is abandoned, and the rate is based on value.

The present rates of duty are six-tenths of a cent per pound on sizes not smaller than No. 5 wire gauge, and 45 per cent. ad valorem (according to the rulings of the New York custom-house) on smaller sizes. I propose to make it 1 cent per pound.

This rate will not, it is believed, on a fair valuation, exceed 45 per cent., if it reaches that. Relative to the duties at present collected on these articles, a statement from the Treasury Department says:

Steel wire rods lighter than No. 5 wire gauge, not being specially provided for, fall under the provision "for all forms or kinds of steel not specially enumerated," at 45 per cent. ad valorem, while both iron and steel wire rods above No. 5 wire gauge are provided for at six-tenths of a cent per pound, or $13.44 per ton. Enormous quantities of the article lighter than No. 5 have been imported at values which, at 45 per cent., have yielded a duty of only the equivalent of $11 per ton. Thus a lower rate of duty is apparently collected upon the finer and more costly than upon the coarser and cheaper article.

The statistics show that the importations of iron and steel wire rods not lighter than No. 5 wire gauge were invoiced at an average value in 1886 of about 1¾ cents per pound, while steel wire rods lighter than No. 5 wire gauge were invoiced at an average value of only 1.1 cents per pound. This would seem to indicate that the latter was undervalued, since (being finer) they are supposed to be worth more than the article invoiced at 1¾ cents.

It is impossible for our manufacturers to make wire rods under the present tariff. Taking into account the price and the duty on pig-iron, and the cost of the various processes necessary to convert it into wire rods, including loss of material, the rate I propose is less than the average rates imposed on heavy bar-iron under the present tariff, and is the same as is proposed by the bill reported by the Committee on Ways and Means on ordinary bar-iron of coarser size. It should be borne in mind that wire rods do not go directly into consumption by the people in that form, but are mainly used by the manufacturers of wire. There is no bill before Congress which proposes any reduction of rates of duty on barbed, galvanized, and other wire used for fencing. These rates have practically kept such foreign wire out of our market, and while they remain unchanged there can be no appreciable increase in the price to the farmer of his wire for fencing, notwithstanding an increase in the duty on wire rods.

During the year 1887 there was imported into the United States 334,698,837 pounds of these rods, of which 247,730,164 pounds were steel, lighter than No. 5 wire gauge, paying duty at 45 per cent. ad valorem, equal to $10.80 per ton, which is less than the duty proposed by the bill of the committee on heavy railway bars, and is only $4.80 per ton more than the same bill proposes on pig-iron. Even my colleague from the Erie district, with his disposition to figure down the cost of manufacturing metals in this country, would hardly pretend that this margin is sufficient to cover the difference between labor in this country and abroad in the manufacture of this article.

The rate proposed in my bill is not more than sufficient to cover the cost, and its adoption will give work to home laborers, prevent the large and increasing importations, and result in large reduction of revenue.

STEEL INGOTS, BLOOMS, AND SLABS.

In the bill which I introduced a change is made from ad valorem duties, as authorized by existing law, to specific rates. The reason for this is "to guard against undervaluations which are shown to have been extensively practiced, particularly in blooms and slabs, which have been invoiced below 1 cent per pound. These undervaluations have been sources of just complaint by reputable merchants and domestic producers."

That the present rates are too low is evident from the enormous increase in importations since the act of 1883 went into effect. What that increase has been will be seen from the following table:

Table showing the importation of various grades of steel, 1884–1887.

Articles.	1884.	1886.	1887.
Bars, billets, etc., valued at 4 cents a pound or less	28,639,833	95,537,022	323,180,959
Ingots: cogged ingots, blooms, and slabs, valued at 4 cents a pound or less	11,548,375	38,752,868	279,819,950

In the ordinary course of business there has been no such increase in the demand in this country for steel in this form as to justify any such increase in importation as above. It has come because the advantage on account of this low rate of duties has given the foreigner the possession of the American market.

The average entered value of this merchandise in 1887 was only $17.75 per ton, which, at 45 per cent. ad valorem, is less than $8 per ton, or only about $1.28 more than the duty now imposed on pig-iron, and only $2 per ton more than is proposed by the bill of the committee.

I apprehend, sir, no gentleman on this floor will contend that this is not an inequality which should be corrected. It is manifest that a necessity exists for a revision and change in the rates on these several articles, and the rates suggested have been made with reference to the cost of production, and are in harmony with the rates on iron ore and pig-iron, and are no more than necessary to compensate for the difference between the cost of labor and other legitimate costs of manufacture in this country and abroad. The adoption of these rates would largely prevent the enormous flood of importations, give the work to our mills and laborers, and cause a large reduction of revenue.

DECREASE OF REVENUE.

The statement has been recklessly made on this floor within a few days that the changes proposed in my bill in the metal schedule would cause an increase in duties of about $9,000,000. This statement was directed presumably to the particular articles to which I have just made extended reference. I have shown that these changes would largely decrease rather than increase the revenue from these articles. I now emphatically assert that the changes proposed throughout the metal schedule would cause a reduction in revenue of over $6,000,000. This result is arrived at by fair and logical estimates, an[illegible] not by that wonderful method of computation by which my colleague [Mr. SCOTT] sought to demonstrate the other day that a duty of $5.50 per ton would be a sufficient protection on steel rails made from pig-iron paying a duty of $6.72 per ton.

COST OF STEEL RAILS.

Respecting the cost of steel rails at the works of Carnegie Brothers, which my colleague has presented, I will give some figures which have been furnished to me, and which I believe to substantially correct, although I have not had time to test the same. At any rate, they will serve to show the worthlessness of estimates made up from imperfect knowledge of industrial processes and which take into account only the cost of the last stages of production.

Pig metal required for a ton of rails, 2,610 pounds, costing		$19.83
Spiegeleisen and manganese		3.24
Cost of labor in the mill		4.80
Cost of ingot-molds, fire-brick, fire-clay, coke, oil, maintenance, etc		3.20
Making total cost of ton of rails		31.07
From this deduct 285 pounds steel scrap	$2.18
Deduct also 10 per cent. from wages of 1888	.48
Leaving as the actual cost		28.41

including those sold as second class. This does not include interest on or profits on capital.

All rails are sold on five years' guaranty, to be replaced, if found defective, at the expense of the manufacturers.

Respecting structural iron, I insert a letter from Belgian makers offering beams, girders, and structural iron for bridges, etc., promising a "nice profit" to all who secure orders. I consider that this circular letter is a complete answer as to the insufficiency of the rate fixed in the committee's bill.

THE COMMITTEE BILL.

Having thus indicated my views of the principles which should govern tariff legislation, I now come to examine briefly the bill reported by the Committee on Ways and Means. It should be borne in mind that a number of the gentlemen composing the majority of the committee have served upon the committee in previous Congresses, have participated in the discussion and preparation of tariff measures, and have had special opportunity for becoming familiar with the facts and information presented to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury with regard to the ambiguities and inequalities of the existing tariff, the innumerable protests, appeals, and suits which have grown out of the faulty construction of its schedules and free-list, and the need of their thorough overhauling and revision, if for no other purpose than to cure the defects and remedy the evils in their construction. They should have been familiar, moreover, with the repeated recommendations for the adoption of specific duties made by the Secretary of the Treasury, as being necessary for the collection of the customs revenue with regularity, uniformity, and certainty.

Notwithstanding these facts, we have before us the bill of the committee, which is not in any proper sense a revision of the tariff, but consists of amendments constituting, I might say, a patch-work upon the existing law, perpetuating and multiplying its numerous infirmities of phraseology; its ambiguities and inequalities, which have perplexed and vexed the executive officers in its administration, have been the subject of volumes of Treasury decisions year by year, and have embroiled the Government and merchants in untold litigation, making it necessary to create new courts for the special trial of custom cases, which are increasing in number month by month and involve unknown millions of demands upon the Government—a constant menace to the Treasury.

Not only have the committee ignored the recommendations of Secretaries Manning and Fairchild and of the customs officers at the various ports for the adoption of specific duties, but have actually, in a large number of cases, substituted ad valorem rates for existing specific duties, thus showing preference for a system which has been abandoned by all the civilized commercial nations on the globe, and which has been fitly characterized as a system under "which thieves prosper and honest traders are driven out of business."

A declared purpose of this bill is to secure "free raw materials, to stimulate manufactures." In execution of this idea the bill places on the free-list a large number of articles which are really articles of manufacture, such as salt, sawed and dressed lumber, laths and shingles, hackled and dressed flax, burlaps, machinery, terne or galvanized plates, glue, glycerine, soap, certain proprietary articles, extracts of hemlock, oils of various kinds, including hemp-seed and rape-seed, olive and fish oils, refined sulphur, various coal-tar preparations, earth paints, distilled oils, alkalies, and various other chemical compounds; various manufactured mineral substances, prepared china clay, quicksilver, bricks of all kinds except fire-brick, prepared meats, lime, plaster of Paris ground and calcined, various prepared drugs and chemicals, and many other articles of like character.

These constitute the products of large and useful industries throughout the United States, in which many millions of capital are invested and employing many thousands of working people.

At the same time the bill leaves or puts upon the dutiable lists such articles as lead ore, iron ore, zinc ores, nickel ore, and coal, which might be called raw materials, if that term can be properly applied to anything involving the expenditure of labor in its production. Further than this, the bill not only makes so-called "raw materials" free, such, for example, as flax, jute, hemp, hemp-seed and rape-seed, crude borax, opium, and hair of animals, but places on the free-list the manufactured products of these materials, namely, burlaps (for bagging, etc.), hemp-seed and rape-seed oil, boracic acid, codein and other salts and compounds of opium, and curled hair for mattresses, etc. [Applause.]

Thus the manufacture of such articles is made impossible in this country, except by reducing American labor to a worse condition than that of labor in Europe. It goes even farther, and places or leaves dutiable certain so-called raw materials, as, for example, iron ore, lead, coal, paper, paints, caustic soda and other alkalies, and sulphate of ammonia, while placing on the free-list articles made from these materials, such as hoop-iron and cotton-ties, iron or steel sheets or plates or taggers iron coated with tin or lead, known as tin-plates, terne-plates, and taggers tin, sulphate of iron or copperas, machinery, books and pamphlets, paintings, soap, and alum. In other words, the bill leaves or makes dutiable the raw material and puts on the free-list the article manufactured from it, thus not only placing an insurmountable barrier in the way of making such articles here, but actually protecting the foreign manufacturer and laborer against our own, and imposing for their benefit a burden upon the consumer in this country. [Applause.]

Again, the bill places lower rates on some manufactured articles than on the materials used in making them, as for instance: Manufactures of paper, 15 per cent.; and the paper to produce it at 25 per cent.

The paint known as orange mineral, 1½ cents per pound; white lead, from which it is made, 2 cents per pound.

Type metal, 15 per cent.; pig-lead, from which it is made, 1¼ cents per pound, equal to 44 per cent.

Axminster and all other carpets 30 per cent.; yarns used in their manufacture, 40 per cent.

It leaves an internal-revenue tax of more than 300 per cent. on alcohol used in the arts, amounting, according to a fair estimate, to as much as the entire amount of duty collected on raw wool, which alcohol enters as a material in a vast number of important and needful articles, which the committee have either made free or have so reduced the rates thereon that the duty would be less than the tax on the alcohol consumed in their manufacture.

In some cases the difference between the duty imposed by the bill on the so-called raw materials and the articles made from them is so small as to destroy these industries, except upon the condition of leveling the wages of home labor to that of Europe.

For example, the difference between the duty proposed on pig-lead and that proposed on litharge and red lead, which are made from pig-lead, is only one-fourth of a cent per pound.

The difference between the duty on pig iron and that on steel blooms is only $2 per ton; between steel blooms and steel rails but $3 per ton; and between blooms and wire-rods less than $3 per ton, coupled with the free admission of hoop-iron, cotton-ties, and sheet-iron in the form of galvanized and coated plates.

It is plain that such legislation would leave the ore in the mines, the pig-lead at the smelting works, the pig-iron to rust at the furnaces, while foreigners would supply our markets with these manufactured products.

In a large number of articles throughout the schedules, not already named, the reductions proposed by the bill are so large that the effect must be to destroy or restrict home production and increase enormously foreign importations, thus largely increasing customs revenue instead of reducing it, as claimed by the advocates of this bill. I mention particularly the following: Earthen and china ware, common window and plate glass and glass bottles, leaf-tobacco, manufactures of cotton, manufactures of flax, hemp, jute, and other fibers, carpets, fancy-goods, brushes, leather gloves, manufactures of India rubber, clay pipes, and other pipes.

It is claimed by the committee that the bill will reduce the customs revenue about $54,000,000. On the contrary, I assert that it is fair to estimate that its effect would be to largely increase the revenue instead of reducing it; while the amount of material wealth it would destroy is incalculable.

Those supporting the bill hold themselves out as the champions of the farmer, while they take from him the protection duties on his wool, hemp, flax, flax-seed, meats, milk, fruits, vegetables, and seeds. And what do they give him in return?

They profess to give the manufacturer better rates than they now have. If this be so, how is the farmer to be benefited, or where does he get his compensation for the loss of his protective duties?

Much has been said about removing taxes upon "necessaries" and imposing them upon "luxuries." What does this bill propose to do in that direction?

It gives free olive-oil to the epicure, and taxes castor-oil 97 per cent.; it gives free tin-plate to the Standard Oil Company and to the great meat-canning monopolies, and imposes a duty of 100 per cent. on rice; it gives the sugar trust free bone-black, and proposes prohibitory duties on grocery grades of sugar; it gives free licorice to the tobacco manufacturer, while retaining prohibitive duties on manufactured tobacco; it imposes a duty of 40 per cent. on the "poor man's blanket," and only 30 per cent. on the Axminster carpet of the rich. It admits free of duty the fine animals imported by the gentlemen of the turf, and makes free the paintings and statuary of the railway millionaire and coal baron. [Great applause.]

I forbear further criticism of this singular measure, for enough has been said to show that my objections to it are not only to the rates imposed on many articles, but to the theory generally on which it has been constructed.

I yield to no man on this side of the House in my desire for continued Democratic control in the administration of the Federal Government. I do not believe the adoption of the committee's bill will make such result certain. I can not be coerced into any particular action upon economic questions by the direction of party caucus. The period of the political caucus has departed, never to return, and yet we should confer and have unity, if it is possible. In these matters I speak only for myself. My convictions on the tariff are strong, and founded, as I think, upon principle, and upon information and intelligent comprehension of the subject. When any one here enters upon the task of invoking caucus power or other modes of coercion, I can only say to him, if he acts with good purpose, that it will prove a fruitless undertaking; or if with ill motive, then I assign him to all the natural contempt which such self-constituted superciliousness deserves. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the question of affording protection to American industries is not a new one. It was the question uppermost in the colonies when our Government was founded. It contributed, perhaps, more than any other consideration to the adoption of the Constitution by the States. It has continued a question in every Congress from that day to this, and it will not die with this Congress nor this generation. It will continue as long as industries exist and our Government requires revenue. But I speak, I believe, with the sanction of the very highest authority when I say that for the first forty years of the existence of our Government there was no question as to the right of Congress to protect and encourage American manufactures by the exercise of the taxing power, or, in the language of Madison, "encouraging by duties * * * the manufactures and products of the country." That this was the policy, too, of every administration, and particularly of every Democratic administration, from Jefferson to Van Buren, is among the incontrovertible facts of our history. Jefferson favored such a policy. In his letter to Colonel Humphreys, January 20, 1809, he says:

> My idea is that we should encourage home manufactures to the extent of our own consumption of everything of which we raise the raw material.

And again, in his letter to Mr. Leiper, January 21, of the same year, he says:

> I have lately inculcated the encouragement of manufactures to the extent of our consumption, at least.

Again, in his letter to Governor Jay, he says:

> An equilibrium of agriculture, manufactures, and commerce is certainly become essential to our independence. Manufactures sufficient for our own consumption, of what we raise the raw materials, and no more; commerce sufficient to carry the surplus produce of agriculture, beyond our own consumption, to a market for exchanging for articles we can not raise, and no more. These are the true limits of manufactures and commerce. To go beyond them is to increase our dependence on foreign nations and our liability to war.

Other quotations might be made to show the interest of the founder of the Democracy in American manufactures and his concurrence in the prevalent opinion that it was legitimately within the powers granted to Congress by the Constitution to so levy duties as to protect and encourage home industries. But as to the constitutional powers of Congress over this subject, none will dispute the high authority of Madison, who, above all others, as said Webster, was most competent to judge of the intentions of the makers of that instrument; but I wish to say for myself, before reading what I am about to present as coming from this authority, that I have never found it necessary or proper, for the justification of my own course, to claim more than such protection as incidentally might come from properly adjusted duties on imports. But that the doctrine that duties might under the Constitution be imposed as a means of regulating trade, passed unquestioned by the framers of the Constitution, who afterwards participated in the legislation of Congress on this subject, will hardly be disputed. But on this point hear what Madison himself says. In his letter to Mr. Cabell as late as 1828, he enters into an elaborate discussion of this question from which I extract the following:

> It is a simple question, under the Constitution of the United States, whether "the power to regulate trade with foreign nations," as a distinct and substantive item in the enumerated powers, embraces the object of encouraging by duties restriction nd prohibition, the manufactures and products of the country.

And then he goes on:

> If Congress have not the power, it is annihilated for the nation; a policy without example in any other nation and not within the reason of the solitary one in our own.

And further on in the same letter:

> If revenue be the sole object of a legitimate impost and the encouragement of domestic articles be not within the power of regulating trade, it would follow that no monopolizing or unequal regulations with foreign nations could be counteracted; that neither staple articles of subsistence nor the essential implements for the public safety could, under any circumstances, be insured or fostered at home by regulations of commerce, the usual and most convenient mode of providing for both.

And in his closing argument he adds these convincing conclusions:

> That the encouragement of manufactures was an object of the power to regulate trade is proved by the use made of the power for that object in the first session of the first Congress under the Constitution, when among the members present were so many who had been members of the Federal convention which framed the Constitution, and of the State convention which ratified it, each of these classes consisting also of members who had opposed and who had espoused the Constitution in its actual form. It does not appear from the printed proceedings of Congress on that occasion that the power was denied by any of them. And it may be remarked that members from Virginia in particular, as well of the Anti-Federal as the Federal party, the names then distinguishing those who had opposed and those who had approved the Constitution, did not hesitate to propose duties and to suggest even prohibitions in favor of several articles of her production. By one a duty was proposed on mineral coal, in favor of the Virginia coal-pits; by another, a duty on hemp was proposed, to encourage the growth of that article; and by a third, a prohibition even of foreign beef was suggested, as a measure of sound policy.
> A further evidence in support of the constitutional power to protect and foster manufactures by regulations of trade—an evidence that ought of itself to settle the question—is the uniform and practical sanction given to the power by the General Government for nearly forty years, with a concurrence or acquiescence of every State government, throughout the same period, and, it may be added, through all the vicissitudes of party which marked the period. No novel construction, however ingeniously devised or however respectable and patriotic its patrons, can withstand the weight of such authorities or the unbroken current of so prolonged and universal a practice.
> * * * And may it not be fairly left to the unbiased judgment of all men of experience and of intelligence to decide which is most to be relied on for a sound and safe test of the meaning of the Constitution, a uniform interpretation by all the successive authorities under it, commencing with its birth, and continued for a long period through the varied state of political contests, or the opinion of every new legislature, heated as it may be by the strife of parties, or warped, as often happens, by the eager pursuit of some favorite object, or carried away, possibly, by the powerful eloquence or captivating address of a few popular statesmen, themselves perhaps influenced by the same misleading causes? If the latter test is to prevail, every new legislative opinion might make a new constitution as the foot of every new chancellor would make a new standard of measure.

Monroe continuously, in all his messages, recommended protection and encouragement of American industries; and in his special message of May 4, 1822, he said:

> Duties and imposts have always been light, not greater perhaps than would have been imposed for the encouragement of our manufactures had there been no occasion for the revenue arising from them; and taxes and excises have never been laid except in cases of necessity, and repealed as soon as the necessity ceased.

I call the attention of gentlemen, Democrats of the later school, to this language:

> Duties * * * not greater perhaps than would have been imposed for the encouragement of our manufactures, had there been no occasion for the revenue arising from them.

In his second annual message Jackson presents in clear language views in conformity with those who preceded him:

> Among the numerous causes of congratulation the condition of our import revenue deserves special mention, inasmuch as it promises the means of extinguishing the public debt sooner than was anticipated and furnishes a strong illustration of the practical effects of the present tariff upon our commercial interests.
> The object of the tariff is objected to by some as unconstitutional; and it is considered by almost all as defective in many of its parts.
> The power to impose duties on imports originally belonged to the several States. The right to adjust those duties with a view to the encouragement of domestic branches of industry is so completely incidental to that power that it is difficult to suppose the existence of the one without the other. The States have delegated their whole authority over imports to the General Government without limitation or restriction, saving the very inconsiderable reservation relating to their inspection laws. This authority having thus entirely passed from the States, the right to exercise it for the purpose of protection does not exist in them, and consequently if it be not possessed by the General Government it must be extinct. Our political system would thus present the anomaly of a people stripped of the right to foster their own industry and to counteract the most selfish and destructive policy which might be adopted by foreign nations. This surely can not be the case. This indispensable power thus surrendered by the States must be within the scope of the authority on the subject expressly delegated to Congress.

And he adds:

In this conclusion, I am confirmed as well by the opinions of Presidents Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, who have each repeatedly recommended the exercise of this right under the Constitution, as by the uniform practice of Congress, the continued acquiescence of the States, and the general understanding of the people.

I quote also on this point one who, though not a Democrat, on constitutional questions may be always listened to—Webster. While this question was before the country in 1844, he said:

I consider it as capable of mathematical demonstration as any proposition in Euclid, that the power of discriminating in custom-house duties for the protection of American labor and industry was understood, not by some but by all, by high and low everywhere, as included in the regulation of trade.

I am aware that about this period another doctrine and another set of ideas, under the leadership of Mr. Calhoun, more in consonance with the institution of slavery which then existed, began to take root in the South, and later to exert its unhealthful influence on the policy of the Government. I do not propose, however, here to traverse the history of this contest and the conflict between the industrial institutions of the two sections of the country, or the results of that conflict. But the new doctrine did not change the opinion of Jackson, nor swerve him from his settled purpose. For thirty years the contest between these two ideas went on. The tariffs of 1842 and 1846 marked the supremacy for the time being of the different views. And I stop here to note that the Democrats from Pennsylvania in the Senate and House of Representatives all voted, I believe, for the tariff of 1842, and all against the tariff of 1846, except Mr. Wilmot.

What would have been the destiny of our Republic had these ideas, with the condition of things of which they were the outgrowth, prevailed I leave to other imaginations. Happily, as I believe, for the whole country, the ideas and the doctrines of those who founded our Government and organized our institutions prevailed instead. Under these ideas our industrial system was founded with the establishment of the Constitution of 1789. The first Congress, in the first act imposing duties, declared that they were laid, among other purposes, "for the encouragement of manufactures." Here was the beginning of that system which has had such a marvelous growth and under which the accumulation of wealth has exceeded in a hundred years that of any other nation on the earth. It is that system I would perpetuate. If Jackson could say he was confirmed in the opinions I have quoted from him, by the opinions of Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, how much more am I confirmed in my opinions by his great authority added to that of the founders and builders of the Democratic party?

I warn the party that it is not safe to abandon principles so fundamental to our institutions and so necessary to the maintenance of our industrial system, principles which attest the wisdom of those who established them by the fruits they have born, the full fruition of which, however, can only be realized in the extension of diversified industries to all parts of the country, not in the North and East alone, but in the South and West as well.

A new era of industrial enterprise has already dawned upon the South. No section of the country possesses greater natural advantages than the South, with her genial climate, her limitless raw materials, her mines of coal and iron, with abundant labor ready to develop them. Considering what has been there achieved in a single decade, what may not a century bring forth for her under a system calculated to favor the highest industrial development? When I read the history of my country and consider the past and present, and reflect on what is before us, I can not believe that the ideas that went down in the convulsions of 1861 will ever again dominate the destinies of this Republic. [Prolonged applause.]

When the chairman announced that Mr. RANDALL's hour had expired,

Mr. BIGGS said: I ask that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be permitted to go on.

Mr. MILLS. I must object. [Cries of "Oh, no!" and "Withdraw the objection."] I can not consent to throw back toward the close of the day gentlemen who are yet to speak. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was to speak at 10 o'clock.

A MEMBER on the Republican side (to Mr. MILLS). We gave Mr. COX two hours yesterday. Why did you not object then?

Mr. MILLS. I appreciate the zeal of you gentlemen of the Republican party; but it was not a proper thing to do. This time has been divided.

Mr. RANDALL. I yielded the hour which I was to have from 10 to 11 to-day.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I believe I am to be recognized next after the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I yield him fifteen minutes of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. RANDALL. I did not hear the statement of the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has yielded the gentleman from Pennsylvania fifteen minutes of his time.

Mr. RANDALL. I appreciate the gentleman's kindness.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I understand that the gentleman from Ohio has yielded a portion of his time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. He has.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I think it proper, Mr. Chairman, with the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Ohio, to make a statement which I think I can afford to make—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. COX. I think it is only decorous and kind that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania should be extended. [Applause, mingled with cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I believe it due to all of us that I should say—and I think I can afford to say it, as I have asked the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to withdraw his objection—that the facts in regard to the occupation of the time to-day were these: It was understood that the gentleman from Ohio and myself were to have so much of the beginning of this day as might be needed; it was the understanding in the Committee on Ways and Means on both sides that the gentleman from Ohio was to commence at 11 o'clock and to speak so long as he might desire to speak; that I was to answer him and should have my time extended.

That was the distinct agreement between the gentleman from Ohio and myself, not personally, but as members of the committee selected by our respective sides to close the debate, with the exception of the remarks which may be made to-morrow by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] and my colleague [Mr. CARLISLE], the honored Speaker of the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] approached me the other day, stating that he was sick and would not be able to speak until to-day, and he asked me to consent that to-day the House should meet at 10 o'clock, and that he should speak from 10 till 11. I said that was a matter as to which I could not answer except with the concurrence of the gentleman from Ohio. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, the gentleman from Ohio, and myself had a friendly colloquy which ended in an agreement made by us, subject, of course, to the ratification of the House, that to-day the House should meet at 10 o'clock; that the gentleman from Pennsylvania should occupy the hour from 10 to 11; and that then the agreement which had been made by the Committee on Ways and Means as to the occupation of time by the gentleman from Ohio and myself should be carried out.

Mr. RANDALL. That is——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. One moment. Subsequently the gentleman from Ohio requested that the House should meet at 10 o'clock on the intervening days, Wednesday and Thursday, to which gentlemen of the Committee on Ways and Means on both sides agreed, and at their request I made the proposition to the House, and in pursuance of that arrangement we have been meeting at 10 o'clock. The understanding was that the gentleman from Pennsylvania should commence at 10 o'clock to-day and continue until 11; that the remainder of the day should be divided as I have indicated. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, however, gave up the time from 10 until 11 this morning at the request of certain persons, and I have no doubt properly——

Mr. RANDALL. A gentleman got the floor last evening. I was here at 10 o'clock to-day ready to take the floor.

A MEMBER. The arrangement made last night was in open House.

Mr. MILLS. They had no right to make that arrangement.

Mr. RANDALL. I should have been through with my remarks by this time if I had been allowed to proceed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. When I came here this morning I was informed of that change in the programme, with which I had nothing to do, but to which I immediately gave cordial assent, feeling that whatever was agreeable to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the gentleman from Ohio, and the House, would be entirely agreeable to me. But when I informed the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee——

Many MEMBERS. Let us have the regular order.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa (to Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky). Have you any proposition to make?

Mr. RANDALL. If I had been allowed to go on I should have concluded by this time.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. My reason for making this explanation is this——

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I think this is the regular order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has yielded for a moment.

Mr. RANDALL. Oh, no.

Mr. MILLIKEN. He has no time to yield.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The proposition I desire to make——

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Let us hear the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The proposition I desire to make——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend until order is restored.

Mr. PAYSON (after a pause). Mr. Chairman, what is the regular order?

Mr. KELLEY. To hear a proposition which is about to be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is general debate on this bill.

Mr. PAYSON. Who has the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor, having had fifteen minutes yielded to him by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky to make a proposition whereby I shall not encroach upon the kindness of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The proposition I was going to make was in order to relieve the gentleman from Ohio, because when he gives the fifteen minutes he proposes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and objection is made that he shall consume more than an hour in the discussion of this question, it will of necessity place him and the House in a most uncomfortable attitude when he takes the floor in his own right. My proposition is that the gentleman from Ohio, who has yielded his time, take it back, and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall have such time as he may desire to conclude his remarks, it being understood that the time so occupied shall come equally out of the time allotted to the gentleman from Ohio and my own time when I shall follow him. [Cries of "That's right!" and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDALL resumed and concluded his remarks as above.

Mr. MCKINLEY was recognized.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Before the gentleman from Ohio proceeds I desire to ask unanimous consent that he, as well as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], who follows him, may be permitted to occupy unlimited time in the discussion—the same courtesy which has been extended to other gentlemen on the committee.

There was no objection.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Mr. Chairman, our country is in an anomalous situation. There is nothing resembling it anywhere else in the world. While we are seeking to find objects to relieve from taxation, in order that we may relieve an overflowing Treasury, other nations are engaged in exploring the field of human production to find new objects of taxation to supply their insufficient revenues. In considering the situation that thus confronts us, and the bill that is presented here as intended to relieve it, it is well that we should understand at the beginning the things upon which all are agreed.

They are, first, that we are collecting more money than is required for the current needs of the Government; and second, that the excess, whatever it may be, beyond the wants of the Government should be left with the people. Our contention, therefore, is upon the manner of the reduction and not upon the reduction itself; not that no reduction shall or ought to be made, but how and upon what principle can it best be accomplished. We agree, further, that the tax upon tobacco shall be removed and thus leave with the people $30,000,000 which they annually pay upon this domestic product. Were we men of business, governed by the principles which guide practical men of affairs, this burden would have been and could have been removed any time within the past two years, and if removed two years ago no surplus would now vex the Administration or alarm the business of the country. In passing, it is suitable that I should say that within the period named no hinderance from this side of the House would have been interposed to the abolition of this tax.

It is also suitable that I should say, for the sake of the truth of history, that gentlemen on this side and gentlemen on the other side of the House repeatedly made efforts during the last Congress to secure recognition for the purpose of offering a bill to abolish this tax, which request was refused by the presiding officer of the House, and refused, too, Mr. Chairman, when every intelligent representative on this floor knew that if an opportunity was given to vote upon a bill for the abolition of that tax it would have received not simply a majority, but the vote of fully two-thirds of the House. I repeat that if that had been done, if the House as then organized had given to the representatives of the people an opportunity to vote upon a simple proposition to reduce taxation, no immediate surplus would be now in the Treasury to interrupt and disturb the business of the country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But this tax was not abolished, and if done now still leaves about forty millions of revenue collected in excess of the public necessity. How can this amount be remitted with the least disturbance to the business and employments of the people?

This, Mr. Chairman, is the real, the practical question. At this point parties and individuals differ, and herein the two lines of political thought which have prevailed from the formation of the Government are clearly manifested, and present for consideration and the ultimate judgment of the people the division between the Republican and Democratic parties upon a purely economic question. I can not forbear, in this connection, to congratulate the country that upon this question our fellow-citizens of all sections and all nationalities, without regard to past party affiliations, unbiased by prejudice, and uninfluenced by passion, can divide. Here is presented an issue which leaves the past behind and looks only to the present and the future, an issue without a tinge or touch of sectionalism, which awakens none of the bitter memories of former discord or divisions, which appeals neither to race nor geographical lines, which knows no North, or South, or East, or West, but brings all within its sweep and contemplation, each dividing upon what each may honestly regard for the best interests and highest welfare of all; an issue which we can consider and discuss calmly and deliberately, having only in view the future of the individual citizen and the highest and best destiny of the Republic. In this spirit I welcome the issue so sharply, and I may say boldly, made by the President in his annual message and now further made by the bill under debate, and approach its consideration with the single purpose to reach if possible a conclusion which shall bring to the country and the whole country, with whose interests we are temporarily intrusted, the widest benefits and the most lasting good. [Applause.]

It will be freely confessed by our political opponents that this bill is but the beginning of a tariff policy marked out by the President, and is a partial response only to his message, to be followed up with additional legislation until our system of taxation shall be brought back to the ancient landmarks of the Democratic party, to a purely revenue basis; that is, that the tariff or duty put upon foreign importations shall hereafter look to revenue and revenue only, and discard all other considerations.

WHAT IS REVENUE TARIFF?

This brings us face to face, therefore, with the two opposing systems, that of a revenue as distinguished from a protective tariff, and upon their respective merits they must stand or fall. Now, what are they? First, what is a revenue tariff? Upon what principle does it rest? It is a tariff or tax placed upon such articles of foreign production imported here as will produce the largest revenue with the smallest tax; or, as Robert J. Walker, late Secretary of the Treasury and author of the tariff of 1846, from whom the advocates of the measure draw their inspiration, put it:

> The only true maxim is that which experience demonstrates will bring in each case the largest revenue at the lowest rate of duty, and that no duty be imposed upon any article above the lowest rate which will yield the largest amount of revenue. The revenue (said Mr. Walker), from ad valorem duties last year (1845) exceeded that realized from specific duties, although the average of the ad valorem duties was only 23.57 per cent. and the average of the specific duties 41.30 per cent., presenting another strong proof that the lower duties increase the revenue.

To secure larger revenue from lower duties necessitates largely increased importations, and if these compete with domestic products the latter must be diminished or find other and distant and I may say impossible markets or get out of the way altogether. A genuine revenue tariff imposes no tax upon foreign importations the like of which are produced at home, or, if produced at home, in quantities not capable of supplying the home consumption, in which case it may be truthfully aid the tax is added to the foreign cost and is paid by the consumer.

A revenue tariff seeks out those articles which domestic production can not supply, or only inadequately supply, and which the wants of our people demand, and imposes the duty upon them, and permits as far as possible the competing foreign product to be imported free of duty. This principle is made conspicuous in the bill under consideration; for example, wool, a competing foreign product, which our own flock-masters can fully supply for domestic wants, is put upon the free-list, while sugar, with a home product of only one-eleventh of the home consumption, is left dutiable.

Any tax levied upon a foreign product which is a necessity to our people, and which we can not fully supply, will produce revenue in amount only measured by our necessities and ability to buy. In a word, foreign productions not competing with home productions are the proper subjects for taxation under a revenue tariff, and in case these do not furnish the requisite revenue a low duty is put upon the foreign product competing with the domestic one—low enough to encourage and stimulate importations, and low enough to break down eventually domestic competition. For example, the duty proposed under this bill upon cotton bagging will extinguish the industry here, and under its provisions we would import all of that product from Calcutta and Dundee. A large revenue would come from this source, because the foreign would take the place of the domestic production. This duty is a revenue one, and gives no protection whatever to the home producer. If it did it would not be a revenue tariff. As the Cobden school of political science puts it, "The moment it is made clear that a tax is a benefit to home producers then the free-trade dogma condemns it. The test is simple and easy of application. Free-trade or a revenue tariff does not allow any import duties being imposed on such articles as are likewise produced at home." Or if produced at home a revenue tariff would soon destroy their production.

WHAT IS A PROTECTIVE TARIFF?

What is a protective tariff? It is a tariff upon foreign imports so adjusted as to secure the necessary revenue, and judiciously imposed upon those foreign products the like of which are produced at home or the like of which we are capable of producing at home. [Applause.] It imposes the duty upon the competing foreign product; it makes it bear the burden or duty, and, as far as possible, luxuries only excepted, permits the non-competing foreign product to come in free of duty. Articles of common use, comfort, and necessity which we can not produce here it sends to the people untaxed and free from custom-house exactions. [Applause.] Tea, coffee, spices, and drugs are such articles, and under our system are upon the free-list. It says to our foreign competitor, if you want to bring your merchandise here, your farm products here, your coal and iron ore, your wool, your salt, your pottery, your glass, your cottons and woolens, and sell alongside of our producers in our markets, we will make your product bear a duty; in effect, pay for the privilege of doing it. [Applause on the Republican side.] Our kind of a tariff makes the competing foreign article carry the burden, draw the load, supply the revenue; and in performing this essential office it encourages at the same time our own industries and protects our own people in their chosen employments. [Applause.] That is the mission and purpose of a protective tariff. That is what we mean to maintain, and any measure which will destroy it we shall firmly resist, and if beaten on this floor we will appeal from your decision to the people, before whom parties and policies must at last be tried. [Applause.] We have free trade among ourselves throughout thirty-eight States and the Territories and among sixty millions of people. Absolute freedom of exchange within our own borders and among our own citizens is the law of the Republic. Reasonable taxation and restraint upon those without is the dictate of enlightened patriotism and the doctrine of the Republican party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Free trade in the United States is founded upon a community of equalities and reciprocities. It is like the unrestrained freedom and reciprocal relations and obligations of a family. Here we are one country, one language, one allegiance, one standard of citizenship, one flag, one Constitution, one nation, one destiny. It is otherwise with foreign nations, each a separate organism, a distinct and independent political society organized for its own, to protect its own, and work out its own destiny. We deny to those foreign nations free trade with us upon equal terms with our own producers. [Applause.] The foreign producer has no right or claim to equality with our own. He is not amenable to our laws. There are resting upon him none of the obligations of citizenship. He pays no taxes. He performs no civil duties; is subject to no demands for military service. He is exempt from State, county, and municipal obligations. He contributes nothing to the support, the progress, and glory of the nation. Why should he enjoy unrestrained equal privileges and profits in our markets with our producers, our labor, and our tax-payers? Let the gentleman who follows me answer. [Applause.] We put a burden upon his productions, we discriminate against his merchandise, because he is alien to us and our interests, and we do it to protect our own, defend our own, preserve our own, who are always with us in adversity and prosperity, in sympathy and purpose, and, if necessary, in sacrifice. [Applause.] That is the principle which governs us. I submit it is a patriotic and righteous one. In our own country, each citizen competing with the other in free and unresentful rivalry, while with the rest of the world all are united and together in resisting outside competition as we would foreign interference.

Free foreign trade admits the foreigner to equal privileges with our own citizens. It invites the product of foreign cheap labor to this market in competition with the domestic product, representing higher and better paid labor. It results in giving our money, our manufactures, and our markets to other nations, to the injury of our labor, our tradespeople, and our farmers. Protection keeps money, markets, and manufactures at home for the benefit of our own people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It is scarcely worth while to more than state the proposition that taxation upon a foreign competing product is more easily paid and less burdensome than taxation upon the non-competing product. In the latter it is always added to the foreign cost, and therefore paid by the consumer, while in the former, where the duty is upon the competing product, it is largely paid in the form of diminished profits to the foreign producer. [Applause.] It would be burdensome beyond endurance to collect our taxes from the products, professions, and labor of our own people.

THE BILL WILL NOT REDUCE THE REVENUE.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a bill ostensibly to reduce the revenue. It will not do it. Take from this bill its internal-revenue features, its reduction of twenty-four and a half million dollars from tobacco and from special licenses to dealers in spirits and tobacco, eliminate these from the bill and you will not secure a dollar of reduction to the Treasury under its operation. Your $27,000,000 of proposed reduction by the free-list will be more than offset by the increased revenues which shall come from your lower duties; and I venture the prediction here to-day that if this bill should become a law, at the end of the fiscal year 1889 the dutiable list under it will carry more money into the Treasury than is carried into the Treasury under the present law, because with every reduction of duties upon foreign imports you stimulate and increase foreign importations; and to the extent that you increase foreign importations, to that extent you increase the revenue.

THE INCONSISTENCIES OF THE BILL.

There is another singular thing in connection with this bill, and I have nowhere seen attention called to it. Now I do not intend to examine the bill item by item. The minority of the Committee on Ways and Means (whose views, on behalf of my political associates I presented) went sufficiently over the bill in detail. But there are a few striking things in the bill which the country ought to understand. No one would have supposed from hearing this discussion but that the bill reduced duties all along the line. You never would have suspected, had you listened to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], or the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], or the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], or other gentlemen of the Ways and Means Committee, that this bill increased duties, would you? How many men on the other side of the House know what is in this bill to-day? I would like to poll them. [Laughter].

Now, here is a single item, steel billets. The present duty on steel billets is 45 per cent. ad valorem. In this bill it is increased to $11 per ton, which is equivalent to 68.33 per cent.—an advance of 45 per cent. Do you know what is made out of these steel billets? Wire fencing, which incloses the great fields of the West; and the raw material is increased 45 per cent. by this bill; and if the principle of the gentlemen who advocate the bill be true, that the duty is added to the cost, every pound of wire fencing that goes to the West will be increased from one-quarter to one-half a cent a pound; all this under a Democratic bill. What else is made out of steel billets? Nails, which everybody uses, which enter into the every-day uses of the people. The duty upon nails is reduced 25 per cent., and the raw material is increased 45 per cent. [Laughter.] As a friend near me suggests, when one end goes up the other goes down; and the latter, I trust, will be the fate of this bill. [Laughter.]

Why, sir, the duty on wire fencing is only 45 per cent. ad valorem; yet the billet from which wire fencing is made must pay in this bill 63 per cent. Here [illustrating] is a piece of wire rod drawn from these steel billets, and which finally goes into fencing. That is dutiable at 45 per cent. under this bill; and the steel from which it is made is dutiable at 63 per cent. What do you think of "raw material for manufactures? [Laughter.] No account is here taken of the labor required to draw the rods.

But, Mr. Chairman, that is not all which is remarkable about this bill, this great bill which is based upon principle, it is said, which the President stands behind and beneath, and which he insists shall be passed, whether or no, in this House, and for the passage of which he is dispensing official favors; for, as the Post, of this city, says, "there is an Allentown for every SOWDEN." [Laughter and applause.]

What else? Here, for example, are cotton-ties; which present another queer freak in this bill. Everybody knows what cotton-ties are; they are hoop-iron cut into lengths just large enough to go round a bale of cotton. Now, if the Southern cotton-planter wants some of this hoop-iron with which to bale his cotton, he goes to the custom-house at New York or Charleston and cuts off all he wants; and he does not have to pay a cent of duty; but if the farmer-constituent of my friend who sits before me [Mr. NELSON], or your farmer-constituent, want some hoop-iron of precisely the same width and thickness, and goes to the custom-house to get it, the Government makes it pay one cent and a half of duty upon every pound he takes, while it lets the cotton-planter take his for nothing. If the Western farmer wants it for his bucket or his barrel or to go on his wagon-bed, or if the washerwoman wants it for her washtub, every one of these must pay a cent and a half a pound, under the philosophy of the gentlemen who framed this bill, while the cotton-planter gets his absolutely free of duty.

Gentlemen, is that fair? I appeal to Southern men who sit before me; I appeal to Northern Democrats who sit around me; is that fair upon any principle of justice or fair play? Talk about sectionalism! You raise the question in your bill; you make a sectional issue which I deeply regret, and I am sure you must upon serious reflection.

There are some other features in this bill which are a little singular. The proposed duty on white lead is 2 cents a pound, while orange mineral, which is made from white lead, is reduced to one cent and a half a pound. [Laughter.] That is another case of high duty upon raw material and low duty upon the finished product.

Why, what in the world, Mr. Chairman, has this bill done for the people anyhow? What has it done for the farmer? It has taken the duty practically off of everything he grows; I will not stop to give the items. It makes free practically every product of the farm, the forest, and mine.

It takes the duty off of wool. What does it give the grower in return? Does it give him anything free? Everything he buys is dutiable. The coat he wears, the hat that covers his head, his shoes, his stockings, his sugar, his rice, everything bears a duty and substantially everything he raises put on the free-list.

The duty on wool must go. What has this Democratic party given the agriculturists in return for this slaughter of their interests? I have looked this bill up and down, and I will tell you what they have done for the farmer. They have given him free sheep-dip. [Laughter and applause.] Sheep-dip is made free and the duty is released. My distinguished friend from Virginia [Mr. LEE], who honors me with his presence here, knows what this article is. It is a preparation which is used on sheep. It is made up largely of the stems of tobacco. It has got a little sulphur in it, I believe; it has got a little lime in it. They put that on the free-list, and that is all they do for the farmer. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. What good is that to the farmer after they have destroyed his flocks?

Mr. MCKINLEY. None. They leave the shears he clips his wool with at 45 per cent. ad valorem. They make his wool free and make the farmer pay 45 per cent. for the shears with which he clips his wool. [Laughter.]

But that is not all. The bell, the sheep bell—if my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] is here, if that golden-shod shepherd from Worcester is here [laughter and applause], he will understand. It is the bell that is put around the neck of the sheep to admonish the shepherd of the whereabouts of the wandering flock under his charge. I am told the gentleman has got on the outside. I learn now he is here in his seat; I am glad to see him. He knows what I am talking about. [Laughter.]

They have left them dutiable at 45 per cent. ad valorem. Why, the sheep even will be ashamed of you, gentlemen. [Laughter.]

Tin plates are made free. What are tin plates made of? Ninety-seven and a half per cent. are sheet-iron or sheet-steel: 2½ per cent. tin. Tin plates are made free. Sheet-iron, sheet-steel are dutiable at 2 cents a pound. Now, I shall not tax you further with the details of the bill. I might spend hours in pointing out like inconsistencies. I will leave their further discussion for the five-minute debate. I only give these samples so that my honorable and learned friend from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] who replies to me, shall take them up and explain the principle on which these rates are fixed and these duties levied.

Mr. Chairman, there is another thing which I wish to call attention to in connection with this bill, and that is the internal-revenue part of it. It seems to have escaped attention. Now, so far as the abolition of the tax on tobacco is concerned we are all in accord; but this new feature of the bill provides for the repeal of the law which authorizes the destruction of illicit stills when found in unlawful use. Under the present law if you find a man engaged in unlawful distilling, not having paid the tax or secured the license, the officer is authorized to go and destroy the whole outfit. This bill repeals that section of the law and provides that the still shall neither be mutilated nor destroyed, but preserved presumably for future violations of the law. [Laughter and applause.]

And in this bill further provision is made that in case a man is arrested for illicit distilling, the judge is charged especially with the duty of looking well to his comfort and to his well-being while he is in the custody of the officials of the law. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

That provision does not apply to any other class of criminals under any of our statutes; but if a man is engaged in violating the revenue laws he must be tenderly looked after by the judge, who is directed to see that he is in every way made comfortable while serving out his sentence in prison. [Renewed laughter on the Republican side.]

THE VICIOUS AD VALOREM SYSTEM INTRODUCED IN BILL.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is one leading feature of this bill, which is not by any means the most objectionable feature, but which, if it stood alone, ought to defeat this entire measure; and that is the introduction of the ad valorem system of assessment to take the place of the specific system now generally in force. You all know the difference between the ad valorem system and the specific mode of levying duties. One is based upon value, the other upon quantity. One is based upon the foreign value, difficult of ascertainments, resting in the judgment of experts, all the time offering a bribe to undervaluation; the other rests upon quantity, fixed and well known the world over, always determinable and always uniform. The one is assessed by the yard-stick, the ton, and the pound-weight of commerce, and the other is assessed by the foreign value, fixed by the foreign importer or his agent in New York or elsewhere; fixed by the producer, fixed by anybody at any price to escape the payment of full duties. Why, the valuation under the ad valorem system is not even uniform throughout the United States.

My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE], who listens to me now, knows that the valuations fixed upon imported goods at the port of Boston are often different from the valuations fixed on the same class of goods, costing the same, arriving in New York, Philadelphia, San Francisco, or Charleston.

So we do not have and can not have a uniform value, for the value is subject always to the cupidity or dishonesty of the foreign importer or producer. It is a system, sir, that has been condemned by all the leading nations of the world. There is not a leading nation that adheres to any considerable extent to the ad valorem rates of duty upon articles imported into its borders; and England has abandoned all ad valorem duties except one, for the very reason that there can be no honest administration of the revenue laws so long as the value is fixed thousands of miles away from the point of production and impossible of verification at home. Henry Clay said fifty years ago:

Let me fix the value of the foreign merchandise, and I do not care what your duty is.

Mr. Secretary Manning, in his very able report made to the last Congress, has gone over the entire question, and he publishes in a volume the opinions of the experts of the Treasury, the collectors, the naval officers, the special agents of the Department, all of them declaring that there is nothing left for the American Government to do but to abolish the ad valorem system and adopt the specific in the interest of the honest collection of the revenue and for the safety and security of reputable merchants. And the Secretary himself says in language too strong and plain to be misunderstood that it is the duty of Congress to abandon the ad valorem and establish specific duties.

I give below these opinions.

Naval officer Burt, of New York, says:

I have long been convinced that a change from ad valorem to specific rates would not only be a benefit to the revenues, but would go far to relieve their administration from the friction and inevitable injustice that have made it in a measure odious. I might give here a résumé of my reasons for this opinion, as frequently expressed officially hitherto, but I presume the Department is fully apprised of all the arguments adduced on either side. I will therefore simply say that the ad valorem system is theoretically the perfect system, and that this has engaged its support by those who have only had opportunity to view it as an abstract proposition. This prejudice in its favor must surely give way before the overwhelming evidences that in practice, particularly with high rates, it breeds injustice, contention, and commercial obstructions that are almost intolerable.

James D. Power, a special agent of the Treasury, in a report to the same Secretary, says:

Ad valorem rates of duty afford temptations and opportunities for fraud which can not be guarded against, even by the most rigid rules and vigilant watchfulness. The assessment of values under this system is based upon expert knowledge of values, the most uncertain and arbitrary method that could be devised. Under the ad valorem system fraud has prospered and demoralized the importing trade, which has passed from the hands of American citizens into the control of men who have taken advantage of our high import duties to enrich themselves at the expense of the revenue and the ruined trade of American wholesale firms. Fraud of this nature is difficult to detect and more difficult still to establish. In the absence of documentary proof it resolves itself into a mere difference of opinion between experts; and the owner of the suspected goods can at all times procure experts who will maintain the correctness of his invoice prices, or he may select an easier and more convincing and efficacious line of defense by procuring affidavits from his buyer or partner abroad to the effect that the invoice cost was the actual price paid for the goods

Messrs. L. G. Martin and A. K. Tingle, special agents, make the following statement to the Secretary:

There can be no doubt that a change from ad valorem to specific rates would help to diminish the tendency to corrupt action and loss to the revenue by the incompetency or indifference of appraisers. The application of specific rates to all textile fabrics would undoubtedly be a work of great difficulty, particularly as to woolen goods, but it is believed that a schedule can be prepared by the skilled officers in the appraiser's department, with the aid of manufacturers and merchants, which would be satisfactory to all interested, except those who are profiting by the present system of undervaluation.

The late Secretary Manning sums up the objections to ad valorem rates, and I beg to quote his language. He exposes the vice of the system which this bill seeks to engraft upon our legislation:

Whatever successful contrivances are in operation to-day to evade the revenue by false invoices, or by undervaluations, or by any other means, under an ad valorem system, will not cease even if the ad valorem rates shall have been largely reduced. They are incontestably, they are even notoriously inherent in that system.

One advantage, and perhaps the chief advantage of a specific over an ad valorem system is in the fact that, under the former, duties are levied by a positive test, which can be applied by our officers while the merchandise is in possession of the Government, and according to a standard which is altogether national and domestic. That would be partially true of an ad valorem system levied upon "home value;" but there are constitutional impediments in the way of such a system which appear to be insuperable. But under an ad valorem system, the facts to which the ad valorem rate is to be applied must be gathered in places many thousand miles away, and under circumstances most unfavorable to the administration of justice. One hears it often said that if our ad valorem rates did not exceed 25 or 30 per cent. undervaluation and temptation to undervaluation would disappear; but the records of this Department for the years 1817, 1840, and 1857 do not uphold that conclusion.

This one feature of the bill ought to be enough to insure its defeat, and if the party associates of the late Secretary had given heed to his sound utterances this vicious mode of assessment would have no place in the bill. Instead of simplifying the collection of the revenues as the title of the bill declares, it will increase the difficulties now experienced, encourage fraudulent invoices, promote undervaluation, impair the revenue, and do incalculable injury to honest importers and merchants.

THE GENERAL EFFECT OF PROTECTION.

I now come to consider the general effect of the protective system upon our people and their employments. There is no conflict of interests and should be none between the several classes of producers and the consumers in the United States. Their interests are one, interrelated and interdependent. That which benefits one benefits all; one man's work has relation with every other man's work in the same community; each is an essential part of the grand result to be attained, and that statesmanship which would seek to array the one against the other for any purpose is narrow, unworthy, and unpatriotic. The President's message is unhappily in that direction. The discussion had on this floor has taken that turn. Both have been calculated to create antagonisms where none existed.

The farmer, the manufacturer, the laborer, the tradesman, and the producer and the consumer all have a common interest in the maintenance of a protective tariff. All are alike and equally favored by the system which you seek to overthrow. It is a national system, broad and universal in its application; if otherwise it should be abandoned. It can not be invoked for one section or one interest to the exclusion of others. It must be general in its application within the contemplation of the principle upon which the system is founded. We have been living under it for twenty-seven continuous years, and it can be asserted with confidence that no country in the world has achieved such industrial advancement, and such marvelous progress in arts, science, and civilization as ours. Tested by its results, it has surpassed all other revenue systems.

From 1789 to 1888, a period of ninety-nine years, there have been forty-seven years when a Democratic revenue-tariff policy has prevailed, and fifty-two years under the protective policy, and it is a noteworthy fact that the most progressive and prosperous periods of our history in every department of human effort and material development were during the fifty-two years when the protective party was in control and protective tariffs were maintained; and the most disastrous years—years of want and wretchedness, ruin and retrogression, eventuating in insufficient revenues and shattered credits, individual and national—were during the free-trade or revenue-tariff eras of our history. No man living who passed through any of the latter periods but would dread their return, and would flee from them as he would escape from fire and pestilence; and I believe the party which promotes their return will merit and receive popular condemnation. What is the trouble with our present condition? No country can point to greater prosperity or more enduring evidences of substantial progress among all the people. Too much money is being collected, it is said. We say stop it; not by indiscriminate and vicious legislation, but by simple business methods. Do it on simple, practical lines and we will help you. Buy up the bonds, objectionable as it may be, and pay the nation's debts, if you can not reduce taxation. You could have done this long ago. Nobody is chargeable for the failure and delay but your own Administration.

Who is objecting to our protective system? From what quarter does the complaint come? Not from the enterprising American citizen; not from the manufacturer; not from the laborer, whose wages it improves; not from the consumer, for he is fully satisfied, because under it he buys a cheaper and a better product than he did under the other system; not from the farmer, for he finds among the employés of the protected industries his best and most reliable customers; not from the merchant or the tradesman, for every hive of industry increases the number of his customers and enlarges the volume of his trade. Few, indeed, have been the petitions presented to this House asking for any reduction of duties upon imports. None, that I have seen or heard of, and I have watched with the deepest interest the number and character of these petitions that I might gather from them the drift of public sentiment—I say I have seen none asking for the passage of this bill, or for any such departure from the fiscal policy of the Government so long recognized and followed, while against this legislation there has been no limit to petitions, memorials, prayers, and protests, from producer and consumer alike.

NO PUBLIC DEMAND FOR SUCH A MEASURE.

This measure is not called for by the people; it is not an American measure it is inspired by importers and foreign producers, most of them aliens, who want to diminish our trade and increase their own; who want to decrease our prosperity and augment theirs, and who have no interest in this country except what they can make out of it. To this is added the influence of the professors in some of our institutions of learning, who teach the science contained in books and not that of practical business. I would rather have my political economy founded upon the every-day experience of the puddler or the potter than the learning of the professor, the farmer and factory hand than the college faculty. Then there is another class who want protective tariffs overthrown. They are the men of independent wealth, with settled and steady incomes, who want everything cheap but currency; the value of everything clipped but coin—cheap labor but dear money. These are the elements which are arrayed against us.

Men whose capital is invested in productive enterprises, who take the risks of business, men who expend their capital and energy in the development of our resources, they are in favor of the maintenance of the protective system. The farmer, the rice-grower, the miner, the vast army of wage-earners from one end of the country to the other, the chief producers of wealth, men whose capital is their brain and muscle, who aspire to better their condition and elevate themselves and their fellows; the young man whose future is yet before him, and which he must carve out with his hand and head, who is without the aid of fortune or of a long ancestral line, these are our steadfast allies in this great contest for the preservation of the American system. Experience and results in our own country are our best adoisers, and they vindicate beyond the possibility of dispute the worth and wisdom of the system.

What country can show such a trade as ours, such commerce, such immense transportation lines, such a volume of exchanges, and such marvelous production from the raw material to the finished product. Its balance-sheet is without a parallel in the world's history—richest in agriculture, greatest in its domestic trade and traffic, and leading in manufactures any nation in Europe. Why abandon a policy which can point to such achievements and whose trophies are to be seen on every hand? The internal commerce of the United States is greater than the entire foreign commerce of Great Britain, France, Germany, Russia, Holland, Belgium, and Austria-Hungary. Why, a single railroad system in this country (that of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company) carries more tonnage and traffic in a single year than all the merchant ships of Great Britain. The whole of Europe has not built as many miles of railroad as this country has during some recent years, and in 1880 the whole known world did not lay as many miles of track as were laid across this country. Great Britain's foreign commerce equals about one-sixth of our domestic commerce. Can we do better under any other fiscal policy? We say not. Wise statesmanship commands us, therefore, to let well enough alone.

Sir Edward Sullivan, in a recent article in the London Post, makes these suggestive comparisons, which I beg every gentleman to hear:

Under free trade the masses must get poorer, because they get less employment. A well-known statistical work gives a comparison of the material progress of France under protection and England under free trade. If there is any truth in figures it ought to startle us from our free-trade dream.

The comparison is based on the returns of legacy duty:

In 1826 England was 10*s.* a head richer than France.
In 1850 England was 19*s.* a head richer than France.
In 1877 England was 5*s.* a head poorer than France.

France has 57 per cent. of her land under tillage, and it is increasing every year.

The United Kingdom has 30 per cent. of land under tillage, and it is diminishing every year, but the population of England increases much more rapidly than the population of France.

The commerce of England has increased 21 per cent. in ten years.
The commerce of France has increased 39 per cent. in ten years.
The commerce of the United States has increased 68 per cent. in ten years.
The commerce of the world has increased 26 per cent. in ten years.
So much for the blasting effect of free trade.

In Germany, so long ago as the 14th of May, 1882, Bismarck, in a speech before the German Reichstag, paid to the Republican tariff high eulogy. He said:

The success of the United States in material development is the most illustrious of modern time. The American nation has not only successfully borne and suppressed the most gigantic and expensive war of all history, but immediately afterward disbanded its Army, found employment for all its soldiers and marines, paid off most of its debt, given labor and homes to all the unemployed of Europe as fast as they could arrive within its territory, and still by a system of taxation so indirect as not to be perceived, much less felt. Because it is my deliberate judgment that the prosperity of America is mainly due to its system of protective laws, I urge that Germany has now reached that point where it is necessary to imitate the tariff system of the United States.

You may try protection by any test you will. You may try it not only by the condition of the individual citizen and his happiness and prosperity and the aggregate prosperity of the nation, but try it by the progress which has been made in invention and scientific development; try it by any standard you may raise, the protective system shows by its results that it surpasses any other. You can match it with no other.

Go to the Patent Office and examine the evidences furnished from that great register of the products of American genius. Take the States which have stood by the protective system, which have believed in it, which have been built up under it, and contrast them with the States whose Representatives have stood in unyielding opposition to the system on this floor. See what result you get. Take Connecticut, a little State, but a manufacturing one. In the year 1887 there were 788 patents granted to the inhabitants of that State, 1 for every 790 of its inhabitants, while for Arkansas the number of patents granted was 65, 1 for every 12,346. Take Massachusetts: In 1887 there were 1,875 patents granted to the people of that State, 1 to every 950 of her population, while to Kentucky there were 245 patents granted, or 1 to every 6,729 of her population. Take Illinois: 1,595 patents were granted to her people, 1 to every 1,929 of her population, while for Georgia there were 130, or 1 in every 11,862 of her population. Here is the list:

States.	Patents.	One to every inhabitant.
Connecticut	788	790
Arkansas	65	12,346
Massachusetts	1,875	950
Illinois	1,595	1,929
Kentucky	245	6,729
Georgia	130	11,862
New Jersey	988	1,144
Louisiana	112	8,392
New York	4,047	1,255
Mississippi	45	25,146
Ohio	1,477	2,165
North Carolina	66	21,208
Pennsylvania	2,109	2,030
South Carolina	52	19,145
Rhode Island	224	1,234
Tennessee	121	12,746
Vermont	112	2,905
Virginia	132	11,458
California	565	1,712
Texas	265	6,006

These figures need no comment; they point their own moral; they enforce their own lesson. They demonstrate better than any argument that I can make that invention and progress and the general diffusion of knowledge follow manufacturing and industrial enterprises. [Applause.]

A HOME MARKET.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the establishment of a furnace or factory or mill in any neighborhood has the effect at once to enhance the value of all property and all values for miles surrounding it. They produce increased activity. The farmer has a better and a nearer market for his products. The merchant, the butcher, the grocer, have an increased trade. The carpenter is in greater demand; he is called upon to build more houses. Every branch of trade, every avenue of labor, will feel almost immediately the energizing influence of a new industry. The truck farm is in demand; the perishable products, the fruits, the vegetables, which in many cases will not bear exportation and which a foreign market is too distant to be available, find a constant and ready demand at good paying prices.

What the agriculturist of this country wants more than anything else, after he has gathered his crop, are consumers, consumers at home, men who do not produce what they eat, who must purchase all they consume; men who are engaged in manufacturing, in mining, in cotton-spinning, in the potteries, and in the thousands of productive industries which command all their time and energy, and whose employments do not admit of their producing their own food.

The American agriculturist further wants these consumers near and convenient to his field of supply. Cheap as inland transportation is, every mile saved is money made. Every manufacturing establishment in the United States, wherever situated, is of priceless value to the farmers of the country. The six manufacturing States of New England aptly illustrate the great value of a home market to the Western farmer. These States have reached the highest perfection in skill and manufactures. They do not raise from their own soil, with the exceptions of hay and potatoes, but a small fraction of what their inhabitants require and consume; they could not from their own fields and granaries feed the population which they had in 1830, much less their present population. The most intense revenue-reformer, the most unenlightened Democrat, will have to confess that New England is indebted in large part for her splendid development to the protective system. Now, has her prosperity and progress been secured at the sacrifice of other interests and other sections? I answer no, but has brought, as I believe I shall be able to show, a positive blessing to all of our 60,000,000 of people.

In 1880 the population of these six States was over 4,000,000. The food products required by their people, the very necessities of their daily life in a large measure, came from other States and remote sections of the Union. They raised in 1880 but one-quarter of 1 per cent. of the total wheat production of the United States. They raised in the same year but one-half of 1 per cent. of the total crop of Indian corn, 2½ per cent. of the oats, 12 per cent. of the hay, and 13 per cent. of the potatoes which were produced in the United States. What did they consume? What did they buy of the Western farmer? Fifty millions of dollars' worth of meat were consumed by their industrial people in a single year. The extent of their needs is strikingly shown by the fact (obtained from the accounts of Commissioner Fink, that during the year 1884 "the trunk lines" brought into New England no less than 470,000 tons of flour and 950,000 tons of grain. At 200 pounds to the barrel of flour, this is an importation of 4,700,000 barrels, or one and one-fifth, nearly, for each inhabitant. During the same year there were exported from Boston and Portland, the only points in New England from which breadstuffs are sent abroad, 2,100,000 barrels of flour, leaving for consumption within these States 2,600,000 barrels. These figures take no account of the large trade by water from New York. I am informed that a large part of the flour consumed in Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Southern Massachusetts is received in this way, but no reliable statistics are available. It is reasonable, however, to suppose, and this comes to me from what I deem good authority, that the amount thus received and consumed offsets a large portion of the foreign exports to which I have referred.

Of the grain received during the same year rather less than 400,000 tons were exported, leaving for New England consumption 550,000 tons, for all of which these States were the customers of the West in addition to the amount grown upon their own soil. In addition to this, New England consumed, in 1886–'87 in her factories nearly one-fourth of the entire cotton crop of the country. More than this, she used in her woolen mills in 1880 fully one-half of the entire wool clip of the United States, and during the year 1886 she consumed more than one-sixth of the entire anthracite-coal production of the country and 5½ per cent. of the bituminous-coal production, and every pound of both came from the Middle and Southern States.

Is not New England (I appeal to the gentlemen of the other side, I appeal to the farmers of the country) worth preserving? Is not the industrial system which makes such a community of consumers for agricultural products possible worth maintaining? Does not she furnish you a market worth fostering? Does not she give you a trade and an exchange of products worth your while to guard with the most considerate care? And does not her condition indicate the wisdom of the policy we advocate? Is not her market better for you than a foreign one? Is not New England a better customer for you, more reliable, more easily reached, more stable, than Old England? [Applause on the Republican side.] Is not Boston a better consumer for the people of the United States than London, New York than Liverpool, Pittsburgh than Manchester, Cincinnati than Birmingham? [Applause on the Republican side.]

New England buys of you for all her wants; Old England takes not a pound or a bushel from you except what she must have and can not get elsewhere.

Now, let us contrast this home market of New England with the foreign market of Old England. In 1880 New England consumed 540,000,000 pounds of cotton, at 11.61 a pound, which in value then amounted to $62,695,000, 20 per cent. greater than the per capita value of all our domestic exports to the United Kingdom, and this was only New England's contribution to the Southern producers of cotton. She sends at least $70,000,000 to the West and Northwest for her food supplies. She sends to the wool-growers of the Middle, Western, and Pacific States $40,000,000 annually for their fleeces. I repeat, is not this market worth preserving, ay, cherishing, and does it not make us long to have New England thrift, New England enterprise, and New England politics more generally distributed throughout all sections of the country? [Applause on the Republican side.]

You can destroy this valuable home market by such legislation is as proposed in this bill; you can diminish this demand for food, for cotton, for wool, for flax, and hemp produced in other sections of the country by following the delusive theories of our friends on the other side of the House; you can diminish the capacity of the operatives to buy of you by diminishing their wages; you can drive them from the cotton and woolen factories to the farms; they will then drift to the West and Northwest, not to engage in manufacture, but in a great measure to become tillers of the soil, and instead of being as they are now, and as they will be under a proper tariff system, your consumers, they become your competitors. They go from the ranks of consumers to the ranks of producers; diminish the consumers and increase the producers. The foreign market for agricultural products is one of the delusions of free trade. If it ever had any real substance as against a good home market that has long since disappeared.

The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee says to the Western farmer, "Let New England go. Pass her by and go to Old England." Well, that is about as practical as the Democratic party ordinarily is. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. DUNN, a prominent member of this House and chairman of one of its leading committees, and I remember to have heard him say what I now read from the RECORD:

> The wheat producer of the Northwest is standing face to face with the wheat producer of India. A few years ago India shipped 40,000 bushels of wheat. Last year (1885) she put into the market 40,000,000 bushels. Can you protect the Northwest farmer against that labor? India can put wheat down in the markets of consumption in Europe cheaper than we can transport it from the fields of production to the markets of consumption; that is to say, India can produce and market her wheat in Europe for what it costs the farmer of the Northwest to transport his to the market of consumption, without allowing him for the cost of production. In other words, the transportation of wheat costs the American farmer as much as both transportation and production cost the India farmer.

In the face of a statement like this, from such high Democratic authority, how, I ask, is the wheat of the American farmer to reach the European market with any profit to our producers? And yet it is to this kind of competition the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee invites the American farmer. Do the farmers want such a market with such a competition? What their answer will be no man can doubt. They reject with indignation and scorn the chairman's moriation. [Applause.] The home market is the best, besides being the safest. It has got the most money to spend, and spends the most. It consumes the most; it is therefore the most profitable.

The masses of our people live better than any people in the world. Great Britain only buys our food products when she has not enough of her own and can reach no other supply. This market, therefore, is fitful and fluctuating, and can not be relied upon as we can rely upon our own consumers. The foreign market under a revenue tariff for agricultural products has not been encouraging in our own experience in the past. It promises less under such a system in the future.

INCREASED IMPORTATIONS THE PURPOSE OF THE BILL.

The chairman of the committee in opening this debate boldly announced that we must increase foreign importations to secure national prosperity. How much does the gentleman and the party with which he is associated desire to increase importations? Are they not large enough already? Are they not now crowding our producers and diminishing their annual productions? Are they not already making labor restless, filling it with apprehension and uncertainty as to the future? Is this country to be the dumping ground of foreigh products? During the last fiscal year over $233,000,000 in value of foreign merchandise was imported into the United States free of duty, and over $450,000,000 additional was imported which paid a duty. Is this not enough? Do the iron and steel workers want further importations in their line, representing cheap labor, to compete with the product of their labor? Over $50,000,000 in value of iron and steel manufactures was imported last year, every dollar of which represented foreign capital and foreign labor, which might well have been produced at home. Every ton could have been made here, and American hands were waiting to make it.

How much labor do you suppose was represented by the $50,000,000 worth of iron and steel that came into this country last year? It would have taken 1,740 puddlers and helpers, working every day for 300 days in the year, to have produced the scrap-iron that came from Europe last year. It would have taken 2,500 men 300 days to have produced the bar and structural iron, and steel billets, and slabs, and ingots which were imported into the United States last year. It would have taken 300 men 300 days, besides those engaged in preparing the raw material, to have produced the plates and sheets, the corrugated iron, and the steel in various forms imported last year. It would have taken 3,700 men 300 days to have made the wire rods and the nails and the screws and wire in various shapes which were imported into the United States last year. It would have taken 800 men 300 days to have made the washers, and the bolts, and the fish-plates, and railway-plates, the steel tire, hinge-iron, and tubes of steel which were imported into this country last year. It would have taken 500 men 300 days to have made the iron and steel rails which were brought into the United States from abroad last year. It would have taken 24,000 men to manufacture the tin-plate imported last year. Summing up these figures 33,540 men, working for 300 days, would have been required to produce the $50,000,000 worth of iron and steel which we imported last year. Do you want that volume increased? Ten million sixty-two thousand is the aggregate number of days' work that were taken from American workingmen, every day's work of which they could have performed, and were waiting ready to perform. [Applause.] Including all branches of labor required to manufacture the fifty millions of imported iron and steel and the manufacture thereof, taking into account the labor employed in the mining, transportation, and manipulation of the raw materials, and it would employ nearly, if not quite, one hundred thousand men.

I do not know what you think about it; but I would not permit a single ton of steel to come into the United States if our own labor could make it. [Applause.] Let American labor, as far as practicable, manufacture American products. [Applause.] And if you do not like it, you know what you can do. [Laughter.] This Government is made for Americans, native-born and naturalized; and every pound, every bushel, every ton, every yard of foreign product that comes into this country to compete with ours deprives American labor of what justly belongs to it.

Do the farmers want increased importations of agricultural products? Of barley alone there were $6,152,000 of value imported last year, and of vegetables a value of $2,276,000. The total imports of the products of agriculture for the year 1887 free and dutiable were in value $197,308,240. Of this sum $46,678,443 was admitted free of duty and the remainder paid a duty. Do the agriculturists want the duties all removed and their products driven from this market. Seven million three hundred thousand dollars' worth of foreign glass came into this country last year. Do the glass-blowers want this volume increased? Five million five hundred and forty-five thousand dollars' worth of pottery of foreign make entered our market last year. Do the potters want this vast sum augmented? Will the wool-growers who were compelled to compete with $16,000,000 worth of foreign wool last year relish the prospect of having their product further displaced next year; and the labor engaged in woolen manufactories in this country, are they anxious that the $44,000,000 worth of woolen goods imported in 1887 in competition with the products of their labor shall be multiplied in 1889? All these importations will be greatly increased if this bill shall become a law. Every invoice of foreign goods which comes here the like of which we can make crowds out just so much American labor. Is there to be no limit to this foreign invasion?

I answer, only to the extent that our people shall make importations impossible by reducing the cost of the home product. This will be the only restraint upon foreign merchandise glutting this market to the displacement of our own. If our present labor conditions are maintained—and this bill gets upon our statute-book—there will be no barrier in the way of a perfect inundation of foreign goods in the United States. It should not be forgotten that low duties or no duties substitute foreign imports for home-made and home-grown products, and to the extent of such substitution take work and wages from American labor. The effect of this bill, and there can be no other, is to increase importations, displace our own products by foreign ones, diminish the output of our factories and mills, curtail the demand for labor, and reduce the wages of those who may be able to get work. This result is as clear and manifest to me as the simplest mathematical problem, and we have only to look at the wage scale of competing nations to know what our labor will come to with free trade or its equivalent. We can not compete with foreign nations without the restraint of a tariff unless we have equal conditions and equal labor cost. To do this we must introduce European conditions and European methods in the United States, and that is what this bill and all similar legislation mean.

"The trammels of trade must be removed" is the language employed by the friends of this bill. How and in what way? First, by removing the duty from raw materials used in manufacture, which of necessity will be at the expense and loss of those engaged in preparing them. But to a tariff reformer that is of little account. This trammel must go, to enable the domestic manufacturer to compete with the foreign manufacturer at home and abroad. After this, and next in order, the trammel of high wages must be removed. This is the most important and essential of all. This is the chief obstruction. Free raw material will not equalize the condition of manufacturers at home with those abroad. Cheap labor, underpaid labor, underfed labor will be the next demand of the advocates of this bill. Some of them have been frank enough to avow it already. This is the inexorable logic of the situation. If we are to control the whole of our own market and send our manufactures across the sea, it can be accomplished in one way only, by reducing the cost of the home product to the same or below the cost of the foreign product. To do this every intelligent man knows involves an enormous reduction of the wages of American workingmen. To this a revenue tariff comes at last and from which there is no escape and against it every true American interest cries out in an emphatic and earnest protest.

I propose a wiser and more patriotic solution of the difficulties of our financial situation. If we will buy more American goods and less foreign, we will reduce the income of the Government and leave and increase the surplus among the people. If we will buy more American merchandise and less of foreign make, manufactures at home will run the year round and labor will be suitably rewarded and steadily employed. If we had some of that lofty patriotism evinced by the fathers, if we were more American in feeling, sentiment, and purpose, there would be fewer advocates of this bill.

AMERICAN WAGES AGAINST EUROPEAN WAGES.

There has been much effort made in this debate to show that, after all, American workingmen get no better pay than the workingmen of other countries. Let us consider this branch of the discussion for a little while, for if it be true that labor here is no better rewarded than elsewhere, then the strength of protection is much weakened. I beg to cite, against the unsupported statements of the gentlemen who have already spoken upon the other side, the testimony of American workingmen whose opportunity for information from experience in both countries, and otherwise, makes their evidence incontrovertible. From the statements made March 10, 1886, before the Committee on Ways and Means, I read. Some of this testimony is two years old, but the only reason it is so is because laboring men were not permitted to testify this year. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Roger Evans, workingman, speaking upon this subject, said:

Of course you must not gauge the American workingman by the amount of coarse bread and meat which will be necessary for him to subsist upon. It can not be. The American workingman must have other things than those. He must be fed and clothed and be able to maintain his family as becomes the dignity of an American citizen.

Another, Mr. Philip Hagan, spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I was born under a free-trade government, and I believe that that free-trade government deprived me of an education. The reason of that was that I had to go to work when I was eight years of age; and I remember also my little brother going to work under that free-trade government when he was eight years of age. I remember well when there was a family of nine of us (including my father and mother), and when my wages for working in a mill were 10 cents per day. That was under a free-trade government. Subsequently I went up higher there to 5 shillings a day, or $1.25. That was about the limit I could reach—six and sixpence a day—and having to pay 60 cents out of that to my helper.

Many members of this committee know all this just as well as I am stating it, and I am not going to detain you any longer; but I will state that as soon as my limited knowledge informed me that labor was protected in the United States I came here. I declared my intentions and I became a citizen of the United States. And now I have a family, and now I make regularly 14 shillings a day. The produce on which I lived in England came mostly from the United States, and certainly I ought to get it as cheap here as in England. I worked for 5 shillings a day in England, and I get 14 shillings a day here. Consequently I am able to send my children to school, and they are getting an education, which their father did not get under a free-trade government. I want to see these children raised up and educated as citizens.

[Applause.]

Mr. Thomas Williams said:

As American citizens we can not be compelled to subsist upon what the working people of England, France, or other European countries subsist upon. The people of this country have made it just what it is, and in a very great measure the workingmen have made it what it is. Some of us have come across the Atlantic, leaving the land of our birth, and have come here with the expectations that we were going to better our condition. We have bettered it in a great measure. We will get along if you will let us alone. The manufacturers and ourselves will fight our own battles.

Mr. Thomas P. Jones said:

I came to this country to better my condition, and I am happy to say that I have bettered my condition. I have made more wages than I ever made in the old country.

It has been shown here to-day, and, as I think, very clearly, that this tinkering with the tariff is not for the best interests of the country; is not for the best interests of the wealth-producers, of the men who built up this country. Then, gentlemen, I take it that it is your duty to throw this bill to the dogs. I certainly do not stand to dictate to you altogether in this matter, but I will assure you this far: that there is a school of education among the working people in this country, and that if this tinkering of the tariff is allowed to proceed; if you will, in spite of our remonstrances, go on destroying our interests and shutting up the industries of the country, our working people will be ere long sufficiently educated to step forth and say, "Gentlemen, thus far shall you go, and no farther." We will elect men and send them here to legislate for our interests if you will not do so. We have the power, gentlemen, and you know it.

Laborers in this country were never so cemented as they are to-day. One of the principal things which has helped us to that is this very bill which the honorable chairman has brought before this committee. Where I live, in Chicago, you would be surprised to see the feeling that exists among the working classes. And why? Because some of the people there worked in this country in free-trade times. I have a brother-in-law who, in free-trade times, traveled to his work 6 miles in the morning, getting there at sun-up, worked all day, and walked home at sundown, and all for a paltry 50 cents a day. I also have worked for 50 cents a day, but not in this country, thank God. I have worked for 25 cents a day, but I do not want to have to do it again. I have seen in the city of Glasgow, in Scotland, men working for 12 cents a day and a bowl of soup. That does not become an American citizen. We can not have such a state of affairs here, and we will not have it.

I have a letter from Mr. William Barbour, of the Barbour Flax Spinning Company, of Paterson, N. J., under date of 31st of March, in which occurs the following:

DEAR SIR: As a stockholder and director of Barbour Flax-Spinning Company, of Paterson, N. J., I wish to make a statement to you regarding the flax-thread industry, and to call your attention to the effect which the proposed Mills bill would have upon it.

* * * * * * *

While I am an American born, and the industry I represent in Paterson, N. J., is thoroughly American, I am also a large stockholder in a flax-spinning company in Ireland; and that you may judge of the relative wages paid in the two countries, I would state that the pay-rolls of the two mills, as recently compared, differed only about $500, the number of hands in the Irish mill being 2,900 against 1,400 in the New Jersey mill.

* * * * * * *

Yours, truly,

WM. BARBOUR.

Hon. W. MCKINLEY, Jr.,
Washington, D. C.

That is, 1,400 American laborers are paid the exact sum which 2,900 laborers are paid for the same labor in Ireland, and yet gentlemen would have us believe there is no difference in favor of the American workingman. [Applause.]

The Singer Sewing-Machine Company maintains a factory in Glasgow, Scotland, as well as its works in New Jersey. It employs one-third more hands in its Scotch establishment, yet the pay-roll there is only half that of its American works, the actual figures being $18,000 and $35,000.

Mr. HERBERT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MCKINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. HERBERT. Can the gentleman tell me the price a sewing-woman in Scotland pays for a sewing-machine and the price a sewing-woman in New Jersey pays for the same kind of a sewing-machine?

Mr. MCKINLEY. Yes, sir; I am told the prices are about the same except a sewing-machine in Scotland costs more than a sewing-machine in America. [Laughter and applause.]

John H. Ross, superintendent Boston Thread and Twine Company, under date of April 23, 1888, says:

We are paying three times the average wages paid for similar labor throughout Europe.

Here is a letter under date of April 26, 1888, from the representatives of at least a half million workingmen of the United States:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 26, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Having seen by the papers that Mr. MILLS and others, in their speeches in the House of Representatives upon the tariff bill, have asserted the wages paid to labor were no higher in the United States than in Europe, we, the undersigned, desire to state, through you, to the members of Congress that such statements are misleading and false. Wages are higher in this country than in any other in the world. Notwithstanding the fact that the statements have been made by members on the floor of the House of Representatives that the tariff only benefits the manufacturer, and that they receive all the advantages from the protection given by the Government, we know that we receive our share of the benefits of protection on the industries we represent.

We therefore emphatically protest against any reduction of the duties that will bring us on a level with the low price paid for labor in Europe. We insist upon the maintenance of a strong protective tariff, in order to maintain an American standard of wages for American workingmen.

Respectfully yours,

WILLIAM WEIHE, President of Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers.
WM. MARTIN, Secretary of Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers.
JOHN CONKLING, Master Workman National Assembly Iron and Steel Workers' Knights of Labor.
JOHN COFFEY, Master Workman Glass Blowers' Assembly 149.
LOUIS ARRINGTON, Master Workman Glass Blowers' Assembly 143.
JAMES CAMPBELL, President of Local Assembly 300, Knights of Labor, Window Glass Workers of America.
WM. J. SMITH, President American Flint Glass Workers' Union.
WM. J. DILLON, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM MCKINLEY,
Washington, D. C.

This bill proposes to equalize American production with European production by bringing down American wages to the level of European wages, and, Mr. Chairman, I give you notice here to-day that you can not do it. [Applause.]

AGRICULTURAL WAGES.

Now as to farm wages here as contrasted with other countries. I have a letter from Mr. Dodge, the Statistician of the Agricultural Department:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
Washington, D. C., March 29, 1888.

The wages of white labor in agriculture in this country is about $24 per month.

In England, the average wages paid for agricultural labor, according to J. S. Jeans, in the Royal Agricultural Society's Journal, was about $12.65 per month. It has been reduced since 1880.

In the Argentine Republic the common farm hands get $10 to $12 per month.

In India agricultural wages are about $20 to $25 per year.

Wages here in the wool-growing industry are two or three times as much as in competing countries.

Consul Warner, at Cologne, in his official report of May 21, 1886, to the State Department, gives a statement of the increase of exports from Germany to the United States, also the wages paid. The laborer, whether he works in iron or steel works, factories, stone-quarries, or railroads, earns as a rule from 47 to 70 cents per day, and for skilled labor he may get from 80 to 92 cents per day. Women, when employed, earn from 24 to 30 cents per day. Boys under sixteen receive 19 to 24 cents a day, and an extra strong boy may earn 30 cents. Working hours are from 6 to 6 in summer, and 7 to 7 in winter, with one hour for dinner.

The consul-general at Vienna, in speaking of the Austrian laborer, says a home of his own, though ever so modest, is beyond his reach.

Consul Tanner, at Chemnitz, Saxony, says:

The customary wages to hired servants on a farm are $57.19 per year, with board and lodging, for men, and $28.50 for females. Field hands are paid at the rate of 5½ cents per hour. Women receive 2½ cents per hour.

Speaking of their food, he says:

Sugar or sirup are never allowed, and but very little milk. Tea is never used. For dinner they have meat and vegetables three times a week, and always on Sundays.

This effectually disposes of the claim that wages in England and other countries are as high as here.

WAGES IN THE SOUTH AND PROTECTION TO RICE.

The wage question in the South is interesting, and I have seen it no better stated, and the reason for maintaining protection nowhere more strongly presented than in the report made this year on the American rice industry, prepared by the Rice Association and addressed to the association of Savannah. I read:

During this period [from 1840 to 1860] the duty on foreign rice was 20 per cent. ad valorem. In all the rice-producing divisions of the country slave labor was then employed, and no foreign rice was imported.

It will be noted that slave labor operates as a positive prohibition to foreign imports. It takes the place of a protective tariff, and presents to labor a choice between the one and the other.

Cheap labor can successfully compete with cheap labor on equal terms and with equal chance of profits in the markets of the world without the aid of legislative protection, and what I have read shows the character of labor best adapted to free trade. This report says the conditions surrounding the American producer have entirely changed. Let me read:

Since the emancipation of the slaves the cost of agricultural labor in the South has been greatly increased. In the rice districts of the Carolinas and Georgia field labor ranges from 40 to 60 cents, and the best expert (not mechanical) labor to $1 per diem.

So that no time since 1865 could rice have been cultivated as a staple product without the protection afforded by import duties upon foreign grain.

Now, with what labor does the Southern rice-grower compete? I will read from this report a quotation from the report of the United States minister at Pekin:

Coming now to the field-hand whom the farmer hires, we arrive at the substratum of labor. The average wages of an able-bodied young man is $12 per annum, food, straw, shoes, and free shaving. Deducting $4 for his clothing, he saves $8 annually—or may do so.

Ten years' saving will enable him to buy one-third of an acre of land (value per acre, $150) and necessary implements by which he can attain by his own labor a subsistence. * * * In ten years he can become possessor of two-thirds of an acre.

The report goes on further:

In Japan, the field-hands receive their food and lodging with wages from $8.60 to $12.96 per annum. The wages of females are about $6 per annum.

In British India the per diem is 6 cents for males and 1½ cents for females.

In Kurnel the highest permanent wages are 50 cents per month.

In Borat men employed by the year get from 80 to 100 pounds of grain per month, and from 44½ cents to $1.98 per annum.

In Bombay and Madras laborers are paid from 6 to 12 cents per diem.

Hence the wages paid at the South in the rice-fields are many fold greater than those paid to laborers in the rice-fields of Asia. Two-thirds of the cost of production is disbursed in wages in the former.

The report then concludes:

The contrast in this element of cost should render unnecessary any further comment than that without the intervention of the existing import tax on Asiatic rice competition would seem impossible.

This argument I commend for its force and fairness, and it makes out a strong case for the rice-grower, who in my judgment deserves protection and which we cheerfully accord; but the same argument applies with equal force to domestic wool, flax, and hemp, and other products of agriculture and manufacture. They are all within the same principle; all of them cultivated and produced with wage-labor greatly in excess of that paid abroad. Yet these American products are to be severely crippled, if not wholly destroyed.

This statement of the rice-growers is a most striking demonstration of the wisdom and necessity of protection. It shows what is true in the North is true in the South. The chief and controlling question is one of labor, and so long as the labor cost here in any department of employment exceeds the labor cost in Europe so long we must have a protective tariff which shall compensate for this difference. And whether the labor is in the rice-fields of Georgia and of the Carolinas, or in the wheat-fields of the Northwest, in the factories of New England, the mines of Maryland and Virginia, or the furnaces of Pennsylvania, Ohio, and New Jersey, it must be protected against the less rewarded labor whose products come in competition with theirs. Either this tariff must be maintained to maintain the difference of wages or one of two things must inevitably occur: we must abandon production in many of the most valuable fields of industry here or our labor must come down to the standard of the competing labor; and we may discuss our theories until the frosts of December and we can not alter the fact.

This is the issue and it can not be evaded.

LABOR NOT ASKING FOR IT—CHEAP CLOTHING.

It is a fact worthy to call to the attention of the House that a labor organization representing a million working men, with its representatives in this city whose sole duty is to look after the interests of labor, have given no sign of approval of this bill. Not a petition has come through this source asking for its passage, or anything like it. Whatever utterance has been made has been in opposition and protest. Every member on this floor has observed the activity of this committee of Knights of Labor in regard to legislation affecting the interests of labor, but in all their vast constituency, found in every State of the Union, found in the fields, in the factories, workshops, and mines, no word or sign but of disapproval and condemnation has come.

The expectations of cheaper clothes is not sufficient to justify the action of the majority. This is too narrow for a national issue. Nobody, so far as I have learned, has expressed dissatisfaction with the present price of clothing. It is a political objection; it is a party slogan. Certainly nobody is unhappy over the cost of clothing except those who are amply able to pay even a higher price than is now exacted. And besides, if this bill should pass, and the effect would be (as it inevitably must be) to destroy our domestic manufacturies, the era of low prices would vanish, and the foreign manufacturer would compel the American consumer to pay higher prices than he has been accustomed to pay under "the robber tariff," so called.

Mr. Chairman, I represent a district comprising some 200,000 people, a large majority of the voters in the district being workingmen. I have represented them for a good many years, and I have never had a complaint from one of them, that their clothes were too high. Have you? [Applause on the Republican side.] Has any gentleman on this floor met with such complaint in his district?

Mr. MORSE. They did not buy them of me.

Mr. McKINLEY. No! Let us see; if they had bought of the gentleman from Massachusetts it would have made no difference, and there could have been no complaint. Let us examine the matter.

[Mr. McKINLEY here produced a bundle containing a suit of clothes, which he opened and displayed amidst great laughter and applause.]

Come now, will the gentleman from Massachusetts know his own goods? [Renewed laughter.] We recall, Mr. Chairman, that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means talked about the laboring man who worked for ten days at a dollar a day, and then went with his ten dollars wages to buy a suit of clothes. It is the old story. It is found in the works of Adam Smith. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] I have heard it in this House for ten years past. It has served many a free-trader. It is the old story, I repeat, of the man who gets a dollar a day for his wages, and having worked for the ten days goes to buy his suit of clothes. He believes he can buy it for just $10; but "the robber manufacturers" have been to Congress, and have got 100 per cent. put upon the goods in the shape of a tariff, and the suit of clothes he finds can not be bought for $10, but he is asked $20 for it, and so he has got to go back to ten days more of sweat; ten days more of toil; ten days more of wear and tear of muscle and brain to earn the $10 to purchase the suit of clothes. Then the chairman gravely asks is not ten days entirely annihilated?

Now, a gentleman who read that speech or heard it was so touched by the pathetic story that he looked into it and sent me a suit of clothes identical with that described by the gentleman from Texas, and he sends me also the bill for it, and here is the entire suit, "robber tariffs and taxes and all" have been added, and the retail cost is what? Just $10. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] So the poor fellow does not have to go back to work ten days more to get that suit of clothes. He takes the suit with him and pays for it just $10. [Applause.]

But in order that there might be no mistake about it, knowing the honor and honesty of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE], he went to his store and bought the suit. [Laughter and cheers on the Republican side.] I hold in my hand the bill.

Mr. STRUBLE. Read it.

Mr. McKINLEY (reading):

BOSTON, May 4, 1888.

J. D. Williams, bought of LEOPOLD MORSE & Co.; men's youth's, and boys' clothing; 131 to 137 Washington street, corner of Brattle—

I believe it is.

Mr. MORSE. Yes, Brattle.

Mr. McKINLEY (reading):

To one suit of woolen clothes, $10. Paid.

[Renewed laughter and applause.]

And now, Mr. Chairman, I never knew of a gentleman engaged in this business who sold his clothes without a profit. [Laughter.] And there is the same $10 suit described by the gentleman from Texas that can be bought in the city of Boston, can be bought in Philadelphia, in New York, in Chicago, in Pittsburgh, anywhere throughout the country at $10 retail the whole suit, coat, pants, and vest, and 40 per cent. less than it could have been bought in 1860 under your low tariff and low wages of that period. [Great applause.] It is a pity to destroy the sad picture of the gentleman from Texas which was to be used in the campaign, but the truth must be told. But do you know that if it was not for protection you would pay a great deal more for these clothes? I do not intend to go into that branch of the question, but I want to give one brief illustration of how the absence of American competition immediately sends up the foreign prices, and it is an illustration that every man will remember. My friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY], who sits in front of me, will remember it. The Missouri Glass Company was organized several years ago for the manufacture of coarse fluted glass and cathedral glass. Last November the factory was destroyed by fire. Cathedral glass was their specialty. Within ten days from the time that splendid property was reduced to ashes the foreign price of cathedral glass advanced 28 per cent. to the American consumer. [Applause on the Republican side.] Showing that whether you destroy the American production by free trade or by fire it is the same thing; the price goes up to the American consumer, and all you can do is to pay the the price the foreigner chooses to ask. [Renewed applause.]

THE POOR MAN'S BLANKETS.

Now, the gentleman had a lot of blankets here the other day. The very climax of the gentleman's speech was reached when he came to a description of the American blankets, and the enormous burdens that the tariff laid upon the poor man's bed and covering. Why, you would have supposed that he was enunciating the national issue for 1888, and I think really that is about all they have left now that civil-service reform is gone. [Laughter.]

Now what is the fact? He told you that for one pair of 5-pound blankets, which he exhibited, the price was $2.51, the labor cost 35 cents, the tariff $1.90, and the difference between the labor and the duty $1.55. Then the gentleman from Texas turned to this House and to his admiring associates and listening audience and said: "Why does not the manufacturer give the laborer that $1.55, the difference between the labor cost and the duty?" which inquiry was followed by deafening applause.

Did he not leave the impression upon the mind of everyone that the manufacturer got the duty? He asked why did he not give it to the laborer? and turning he said: "Of course he would not do that; he put it into his pocket." I will tell you the reason, or at least a sufficient reason why the manufacturer did not give it to the laborer. It was because he did not get it himself.

I do not know where the gentleman got his figures, but I have a careful statement from one of the leading blanket manufacturers of this country, and I intend to give the facts fully.

Blankets are numbered according to grade and according to weight. There are several grades of five-pound blankets numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5. A No. 1 five-pound blanket made in the city of Philadelphia sells for $1.72. The labor represented in the blanket is 87½ cents; the duty is $1.02. Of a scarlet blanket, five pounds, the price is $2.27; the labor is 87½ cents; the duty is $3.17. Of the white all-wool Falls of Schuylkill blanket the price is $3.62; the labor $1.05; the duty $2.60. Of the Gold-Medal blanket the price is $4.53; the labor $1.05; the duty $3.50.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the duty was added to the cost, what would the American manufacturers get for these blankets? They should get for the first blanket $2.74. How much do they get? They get only $1.72. They should get for the second blanket, duty added, $3.77. How much do they get? They get $2.27. They should get for the third $5.12. How much do they get? They get $3.17. They should get, duty added, for the fourth class $6.22. How much do they get? They get $4.35. They should get, duty added, for the highest grade, $8.03. How much do they get? They get $4.65.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what did these same blankets cost in 1860 under a revenue tariff, under the free-trade domination of this country by the Democratic party? What did we pay for the same blankets that year as contrasted with what we pay now? The blanket that sells to-day for $1.02 sold in 1860 for $2. The blanket that sells now for $1.45 sold in 1860 for $2.50. The blanket that sells now for $1.31 sold in 1860 for $2.25. The blanket that sells now for $1.90 sold in 1860 for $3.50. The blanket that sells now for $2.58 sold for $3.75 in 1860. The blanket that sells now for $4.35 sold for $7.50 in 1860. The blanket that sells for $5.85 now sold for $10 in 1860. The blanket that sells now for $6.80 sold for $13 in 1860.

Now let us see how the wages are, for that is an essential element in this question. In 1860 a spinner got $6 a week in this same establishment, and I am speaking from the books of the manufacturer. It is no idle and hearsay, second-hand statement that I am making, nor does it come from any foreign source, nor is it based on any information from abroad. It is taken from the actual books of a manufacturer of blankets in Philadelphia, who has been manufacturing for a great many years. A spinner got for a week's work in 1860, $6. What does he get now? Fifteen dollars. Six dollars a week in 1860, and $15 a week in 1888! A piecer boy got $1.15 a week in 1860, and he gets $3.50 now. A weaver got $1 in 1860, and $10 in 1888. A finisher, unskilled, got $4.15 in 1860, and he gets $9 in 1888. A skilled finisher got $6 in 1860, and $16 in 1888. A dye-house hand, unskilled, got $4.25 in 1860, and he gets $9 in 1888. A common laborer $1 in 1860, and gets $7.50 in 1888. A skilled laborer got $4.50 in 1860, and he gets $9 in 1888. An engineer got $6.50 in 1860, and he gets $16 in 1888.

The weekly earnings of the spinner in 1860 could buy three pairs of cheap blankets for one week's work. The spinner under American protection in 1888, for the price of one week's work can buy fifteen pairs of blankets. Talk about productive capacity! Think about buying capacity! The spinner buys his blankets for one-half what they cost him in 1860; and he gets two and a half times as much for his labor in 1888 as he got in 1860. Do you wonder these men do not like your bill? [Applause.] Do you wonder these men condemn the action of the committee for not listening to their protests? Why, you are preparing here to-day—and that is the purpose and effect of this bill—you are preparing here to reduce the scale of American wages. But I am not through with the blanket issue. You may think that what I have already given is sufficiently exhaustive, but I have an actual transaction here that I know will be of interest to the members of this House, and, therefore, at the expense of wearying your patience, I am going to ask your attention to it. [Cries of "Go on!"]

THE UNITED STATES BUYING FOREIGN BLANKETS.

On the 25th of March, 1887, the United States Government advertised for bids for the purchase of blankets for the use of the medical department of the Army. This was in 1887, under the present Administration. There were foreign bids and there were American bids. Now, if the President is right in saying that the duty is added to the cost, then the foreign cost, duty added, ought to be just equal to the American price. Now, what are the facts of this transaction? As I have said, there was a foreign bid, and there was an American bid. The foreign bid was for a four-pound blanket for medical purposes, to be furnished for $2.25\frac{7}{10}$. For the same four-pound blanket for the same purposes, the American bid was $2.56, there being a difference of $30\frac{3}{10}$ cents. Who, who do you suppose got the contract? There was a foreign bid, and an American bid, and the difference between the bids was 30 cents on each blanket. Now tell me which manufacturer, the American or English got the contract? Is there anybody here who would not have given it to the American, there being a difference of only 30 cents between the bids?

Is there any gentleman on this floor who would send abroad to get a pair of blankets merely to save 30 cents on them, thus taking away from the American manufacturer and the American farmer and the American laborer that much business? However that may be, that contract did go abroad. English labor, with foreign wool, made those 2,000 blankets for the use of our army. American labor was boycotted and they came in without paying any duty. The Government took advantage of a law that stands on the statute-book and admitted them free of duty. There being so little revenue in the Treasury, it was necessary, of course, to save every penny, so they took advantage of that law which permits the United States to bring in goods free of duty.

Now let us look at the figures. The duty on blankets of that quality is 18 cents a pound and 35 per cent. ad valorem. Eighteen cents a pound upon 2,000 blankets, 4 pounds each, is $1,440; 35 per cent. ad valorem is $1,576.40, making a total duty upon those 2,000 blankets, which were bought from a foreign blanket maker, of $3,016.40. The cost of those blankets, free of duty, amounts to $4,504; with the duty added the total would be $7,520.40.

Now, if the President is right and if the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means is right in saying that this duty is added to the price to the American consumer, then $7,520.40 is exactly what the American price would be.

Now, then, gentlemen, what was the American price? The American price was $5,120. That is, it was $2,400 less than the foreign cost, duty added. Without any duty, the difference between the cost of the American and the cost of the foreign blankets, the whole 2,000, was about $600. Now you see the American manufacturer does not get the duty, and that, I submit, is a sufficient reason why he does not give it to his workmen. I am very sorry, Mr. Chairman, that the President of the United States did not know of this transaction, which had occurred under his own administration, so that he might have avoided making the blunder which he made in his message when he said that the duty was added to the cost. And I do not know what those around me may think about it, but I am very sorry that our Government went abroad and bought those blankets just to save 30 cents apiece on them. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I wish that this Government of ours, which is supported by its own people, and not by foreigners, would patronize its own people. I think that is an example of patriotism which should be set by those charged with public administration. I wish the men who pay the taxes to support this Government, to pay the President's salary and other expenses of the Government, would be patronized when the Government has anything to buy, don't you? And are you not a little ashamed of this transaction, all of you? I do not know whether the like was ever done under any former administration or not; but it never ought to be done, except in time of war or great public necessity, by any future administration of any party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

ALL EUROPE INTERESTED IN THE PASSAGE OF THIS BILL.

All Europe is watching the progress of this bill. Its immediate promoters are not following it with keener vigilance and more absorbing interest than their foreign sympathizers. All trades, all manufacturers across the Atlantic, are watching it with the deepest concern and anticipating the rich harvest which awaits them when our gates shall be opened, our industrial defenses torn down, and free and unrestrained access to our splendid markets afforded for the products of their cheap labor.

I have in my hand the Pottery Gazette, published in London, under date of January 2, 1888, from which I read:

Earthenware is reported to be reduced to 33 per cent. This will help the trade, but we trust the men and masters here will not be too sanguine as to results and upset the trade.

Their information upon the earthenware schedule is quite accurate; they had it in advance of the minority members of the committee, and while thoroughly pleased the editor of the Gazette feels constrained to advise the men and masters not to be too sanguine as to results and thereby upset the trade and defeat the bill. He advises them not to rejoice too soon; the news is almost too good to be true, and too much ecstacy on their part might prejudice it before the American House. Why should they rejoice when our tariff goes down? Our workingmen and employers have no such feeling. They dread it; they oppose it; they know what it means to them. They know that it will benefit the foreign rival and bring distress to them.

The reduction of duties upon earthenware will help Staffordshire, England, and their people know it well, while it will hurt American potters and the labor they employ.

Again I read:

Our American friends are expected over shortly—

They are detained here during the pendency of this bill—

when we shall hear what the effect is to be of the promised alteration in their tariff. The protected manufacturers in the States are already making efforts to stop the reduced imports, but it will be useless.

With what confidence they speak! They mistake the temper of our people. They are staking too much upon the fulfillment of Democratic pledges.

This long nursed and favored class must give way a little to the consumer, whose long suffering has at length come to the front.

The generous sympathy which the English manufacturer has for the American consumer is touching indeed.

The consumers are as ten to one of the United States inhabitants, and the protection to the pottery and glass manufacturer of the commoner description represents the cost of labor many times over.

This reads like the speech of the gentleman from Texas. It sounds so like the Democratic speeches of the last two weeks that we might well conclude that the gentlemen of the majority on this floor were representing an English and not an American constituency.

Again I read:

Is this fair to the housekeeper? Is it right? Nay, is it just?

This sympathy would have been more highly appreciated by the American consumer had it been extended at a time when the Staffordshire potteries controlled the American market, before we had become successful competitors, and when they were charging us 100 per cent. more for the coarse tableware that went into the houses of the masses than we now have to pay, resulting from the competition created by our own potteries. The hope of foreign producers is in the Democratic party.

Foreign producers are already preparing for the new order of things. They are already establishing agencies in the United States, preparing to invade and occupy this market.

I have among my notes a letter from Andris Jochams, of Charleroi, Belgium, proprietors of the La Providence Rolling Mills, which gives unmistakable evidence of preparation for the passage of this bill.

Let me read the letter:

CHARLEROI, le 14th March, 1888.

DEAR SIRS: I beg to take notice that we have appointed Messrs. Weir, Smith & Rogers as our sole and general agents in the United States of America for the sale of our architectural iron, as per circular inclosed, and you will oblige us in addressing your demands to them in future.

With the prospect of a reduction in duties on architectural iron and steel in your country we will be soon ready to offer you such advantages in prices and quality that you will find a nice profit in importing from us.

We remain, dear sirs, with much respect, your obedient servant.

ANDRIS JOCHAMS.

Messrs. WEIR, SMITH & ROGERS, 41 Broadway, New York.

The American public, it will be observed, is assured that "with the prospect of reduction of duties on architectural iron and steel in your country we will be soon ready to offer you such advantages in prices and quality that you will find a nice profit in importing from us." Reduced duties are to increase their profit which, for the time, at least, is to be divided so as to give to the American importer a "nice profit."

TRUSTS.

There has been much discussion about trades and combinations in the course of this debate—trusts to control prices, diminish production, extinguish competition—and these are made a fruitful theme for vicious assaults upon the tariff. This is the only new feature that has been developed in the tariff discussion, and therefore deserves passing attention. I have no sympathy with combinations organized for this or any other purpose, to control the supply and thereby control prices. I regard all such as against public policy and opposed to fair and legitimate trade. They are, however, in no wise related to the tariff, and the tariff is in no way responsible for them.

There is nothing in the tariff laws to promote or even suggest them. They are of foreign origin—they originated in free-trade countries. They can and do exist among producers and factors not in any way affected by the tariff. They are of recent date in the United States. The most widely known trusts of the country are not engaged in what are termed "protected industries." The oil trust and the whisky trust, which are so commanding and powerful, which make prices and alter them, control supply and production, these surely can not be charged to a protective tariff, for nothing which they make or merchandise is subject to protective tariffs. The most oppressive trusts—oppressive to the American consumer—are those which deal in foreign goods, and all of which will be promoted and strengthened by the passage of this bill.

There is a trust or combination made up of all the plate-glass manufacturers of Europe. I have here a circular which is dated London, 25th of April, 1887, and which reads:

DEAR SIR: We beg to inform you that the Associated Plate-Glass Manufacturers have revised their prices for plate-glass of all descriptions, and that, withdrawing all previous quotations, we inclose you herewith our tariff of prices, the discount from which will be 30 per cent., with the exception of glazing glass used for silvering purposes, the discount from which will be 25 per cent.

We are, dear sir, yours, respectfully,

LONDON AND MANCHESTER PLATE-GLASS MANUFACTURING COMPANY (LIMITED.)
UNION PLATE-GLASS COMPANY (LIMITED.)
PILKINGTON BROTHERS.

A de GRAND BY, AGENCE GÉNÉRALE DES-GLACERIES, Belges.

This trust is still in force. Here is a foreign combination to control the price of plate-glass, and the gentlemen on the other side are engaged in making the monopoly more complete and controlling by reducing the import duties now paid on their product and by relieving them of a burden they now have to bear, and thus enabling them to break down American competition, which alone has reduced the price of plate-glass, and now prevents the most extortionate exactions for the foreign product upon American consumers.

Here, again, is an importers' trust in the same line of goods. I read from the New York Herald of February 28 an account of the investigation by the New York Legislature:

THE GLASS TRUST.

Mr. James H. Heroy, an importer of plate and French glass, was next called to tell what he knew about the glass trust. He is a spry old gentleman who has been in the business for fifty years. Colonel Bliss asked the witness to identify a circular. It is a very peculiar circular, and will open the eyes of the public, if not the eyes of the committee. It is as follows:

"HENRY C. MARRINNER,
"Plate and sheet-glass importer, No. 126 South Fifth avenue:

"We beg leave to quote you 70, 10, and 5 per cent. discount from the price-list, January 20, 1887, for French window-glass. In case you wish to make any large purchases we can make you extra discounts as follows: If you receive from us or any members of our association in New York (which includes all the regular importers), either all from one house or part from each of the houses, one hundred boxes in one calendar month, you are entitled to an extra discount of 5 per cent.; or if the deliveries to you in any one calendar month from any or all of these houses should amount to $1,000, then you will be entitled to an extra discount of 10 per cent. This is done, as you will see, to give large purchasers the advantage over small buyers, which they have been long entitled to, but which could not be given to them until we made our present organization to regulate prices.

"This arrangement of rebates takes effect from February 1.

"We can also make deductions from the new price-list of January 5, 1888, for colored, enameled, ground, and cathedral glass, extra discounts, as follows:

"For orders of twenty cases or 2,000 feet or more at one time, 10 per cent. discount.

"For import orders of 7,500 feet or more of cathedral and one hundred cases or more colored, enameled, and ground glass we will make special prices, according to the conditions of the order.

"Yours, very truly,

"HEROY & MARRINNER."

NOTHING DONE IN A HURRY.

There was no doubt about the intention of that trust. Mr Heroy said "it was simply" to make prices below which they would not sell their goods. At the last meeting he attended he thought it was the desire of the combination to reduce prices, and added, "We have not yet decided what to do in the case of a man who undersells us. We do not decide these things in a hurry. As a result of the combination prices have advanced. I can't tell exactly the amount of the business done. It is largely exaggerated, but including all branches, it is about $20,000,000."

I have also in my possession a copy of the trust contract. Not content with making this combination among themselves, they sought in every way possible to induce our American producers of plate-glass to join them and assist in fleecing the American public.

There is a foreign trust on china and earthen ware. I have the evidence here in the London Pottery Gazette of March 10, 1888, from which I read:

If any manufacturers are not true to the rules of the new association the bond they will have signed will enable their fellow-manufacturers to sell them up "rump and stump." Nothing but the state of dire necessity into which the trade has fallen would tempt men to put their hands to such a bond. The scheme has just been successful with the china manufacturers. They have just obtained a second advance.

If the keen buyers who always want to beggar the trade and reduce prices say to a manufacturer who will not sell at lower than the fixed rate, "Well, if I am forced to pay the association price I will not buy from you," such manufacturer can reply, "All right; if you buy from another, and I have to stand for orders, I shall get my pull out of your business, for our rules will not let me suffer through refusing to reduce at your request." So you see one manufacturer can not be played off against the others.

There is a foreign tin trust and a foreign iron trust to control prices and deprive the public of the advantages of legitimate competition. All these are to be benefited by this bill. Its author should change its title so as to make it read, "An act to promote foreign trusts and combines and break down American competition." We should set our faces against all these unnatural associations. We should crush out those at home, and do nothing to encourage those abroad who organize to prey upon the American market. We can control the former, but the latter, while robbing our own citizens, are beyond our control and out of our jurisdiction.

PROTECTION SENTIMENT EXTENDING.

Mr. Chairman, while the Democratic majority, aided by the active force of the Administration, is seeking to break pown the protective system, under which we have realized such unexampled prosperity, what do we witness elsewhere and in other countri ? Within the last six months there was held a great meeting in England, representing thirty thousand workingmen. The meeting was called to consider the depressed condition of labor, and to demand such a change of the fiscal legislation as would abandon free trade in the United Kingdom and adopt a protective tariff. They resolved—

First. That this meeting is strongly of opinion that the time has come when all classes interested in the nation's prosperity should unite in demanding a revision of its fiscal system.

Second. That this meeting records its opinion that all articles imported from abroad should bear a fair share of taxation with the same articles produced at home.

These resolutions, with a suitable memorial, were presented to the British Parliament. In the same month the Chamber of Commerce of Lincolnshire, England, adopted the following resolutions:

That this meeting is of opinion that the fearful depression both of trade and agriculture are intimately connected with, and both are caused by, foreign competition, resulting in low prices, which are affecting all the industries of this country; that false free trade is a failure obtained at the expense of the native producer. This meeting, therefore, begs to urge of their representatives in Parliament and the Government the necessity of speedily taking measures to prevent the ruin impending over trade, and especially over the land of this country and all concerned in it, either as owners, cultivators, or tradesmen, and that a reconsideration should at once take place of our present fiscal arrangement.

The working people of England find that competition with countries employing cheaper labor too oppressive to bear longer, and are demanding in the interest of themselves and families to be saved from the further degradation it will entail. It is not American competition they dread; it is the competition of France, Germany, and Belgium—countries whose labor is even more poorly paid than the labor of England. They have come to appreciate at last that nothing but tariffs which are defensive in their character will save them from utter ruin and destitution. We will be in precisely the same situation if this bill shall become a law. Our competition is with all the world, for no labor is so well paid as ours, and being the highest paid labor invites the sharpest competition from the lowest. We will have no objection to free trade when all the competing nations shall bring the level of their labor up to ours; when they shall accept our standard; when they shall regard the toiler as a man and not a slave; but we will never consent while we have votes and the power to prevent the dragging down of our labor to that of the European standard. [Applause.] Let them elevate theirs; let them bring theirs up to our level, and we will then have no contention about revenue or protective tariffs. We will meet them in open field, in home and neutral markets, upon equal footing, and the fittest will survive. [Applause.] This is no time to seriously think of changing our policy. The best sentiment, the practical judgment of mankind, is turning to it. Sir Charles Tupper said a year ago in the Canadian House of Commons:

No person who has carefully watched the progress of public events and public opinion can fail to know that a very great and marked change has taken place in all countries, I may say, in relation to this question (protection). * * * In England, where it was a heresy to intimate anything of that kind a few years ago, even at the period to which I am referring, a great and marked change in public opinion has taken place. Professor Sidgewick, a learned Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and professor of moral philosophy in that great university, and the gentleman who read at the meeting of the British Association in 1886 a paper on political economy, has published a work in which opinions that would have been denounced as utterly fallacious and heretical at that time have been boldly propounded as the soundest and truest principles of political economy. * * * Statesmen of the first rank, men occupying high and commanding positions in public affairs in England, have unhesitatingly committed themselves to the strongest opinion in favor of fair protection to British industry.

CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES.

Why, even Canada, a dependency of free-trade England, is too wise to favor the false doctrines of her mother, and has rejected her teachings, and to-day is prosperous under a protective system, which she in the main borrowed from us. I wish every citizen might read the budget speech of the minister of finance in Canada, and contrast it with that of my honored but misguided friend from Texas. On the 12th of May, 1887, in the Commons, Sir Charles Tupper, in speaking of a previous period in the history of Canada under free trade, said:

When the languishing industries of Canada embarrassed the finance minister of that day, when instead of large surplus large deficits succeeded year after year, the opposition urged upon that honorable gentleman that he should endeavor to give increased protection to the industries of Canada, which would prevent them from thus languishing and being destroyed. We were not successful—I will not say in leading the honorable gentleman himself to the conclusion that that would be a sound policy, for I have some reason to believe that he had many a misgiving on that question—but at all events we were not able to change the policy of the gentleman who then ruled the destinies of Canada. As is well known, that became the great issue at the subsequent general election of 1878, and the Conservative party being returned to power, pledged to promote and foster the industries of Canada as far as they were able, brought down a policy through the hands of my honored predecessor, Sir Leonard Tilley, * * * and I have no hesitation in saying that the success of that policy thus propounded and matured from time to time has been such as to command the support and confidence of a large portion of the people of this country down to the present day.

Under this system he proceeds to show that Canada has enjoyed a prosperity the like of which she never enjoyed before, and then, instead of recommending a reduction of duties, proposes the increase of duties upon certain foreign merchandise, to the end that Canadian industries may be fostered thereby.

Now, sir, what has been the result of this policy [of protection]? Enormous taxation upon the necessaries of life has been a constant drain upon the people; taxation, not only to support the expenditures of the Government, but taxation so contrived as to fill the pockets of a privileged class and take from the people five dollars for private purposes for every dollar that it carries to the public Treasury. * * * This is one of the vicious results, etc. * * * What use have our manufacturers for the tariff at all? Why are they constantly beseeching Congress not to ruin them by reducing war rates? * * * It is a policy that is at war with the institutions of this country—the concentration of the wealth of the country in the hands of a few.

My friend has not read with profit or purpose the history of his country. Wedded to the economic teachings of Calhoun and Walker, he has not observed their contradiction and refutation in the matchless progress of his country. He still lives in the past. The condition of his own State, her boundless resources, appeal to him, but her voice, if heard, is not heeded. He seeks to throw across her pathway and the pathway of the Republic the tattered dogmas of a half century ago and stop the wheels of progress, interrupt our advancing civilization, and stifle the just aspirations of the people. The country is in no frame of mind for such retrogression; against it every instinct of humanity revolts, every noble sentiment protests.

If the people of the country want free trade or a strictly revenue tariff it is their privilege to have it. The majority voice should be controlling, but it must be after a full, fair, and candid expression. I do not believe that a majority in this House were instructed by their constituents to vote for this bill or any other committed to the doctrine of free trade. If the issue had been so understood many of the gentlemen who are promoting this legislation would not be here. I do not believe the country understood in 1886 that if the Democratic party carried a majority in the House it would do what is now being proposed. How many Representatives on that side of the House would have been left at home upon a platform favoring free wool and substantially free agricultural products? More by far than your majority.

LET THE PEOPLE VOTE ON THE ISSUE BETWEEN A REVENUE TARIFF AND A PROTECTIVE TARIFF.

The opportunity of the people of this country is next November. If they want free trade they can so vote, but they must have it after full discussion. The majority now on the floor of this House were not instructed by the elections in 1886 to vote for this bill; there was no such issue. Wherever we sought to make it the issue it was obscured or denied by Democratic protectionists in the North. Nobody knows that better than the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], the friend of labor. [Laughter.]

The House of Representative, I say, was not elected upon that issue. I challenge your party, under the instructions given you by the people two years ago, to force this measure through the House.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. MCKINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. I voted for the consideration of the Morrison bill; and my people sent me back here by double my previous majority.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I am aware of that; I had not intended to allude to the gentleman at all. A man who has under his control thirty or forty thousand miles of railroad; a man who has coal mines all over creation; a man who has great plantations down here in Virginia, must be a very weak candidate, indeed, if he can not come to Congress in an off year on almost any issue. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCOTT. I have been a Democrat all my life; and in a Presidential year I was elected to this House in a district which gave Mr. Blaine 6,000 majority, and gave me 900. [Applause.]

Mr. MCKINLEY. I am very glad if the gentleman made the issue on free trade; but if he did, he is the only man in the North who did so. And when he was elected in 1884, he had not voted for the Morrison bill; had you [addressing Mr. SCOTT]?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Did you vote for the Morrison bill before 1884?

Mr. SCOTT. I voted for the Morrison bill before my people elected me for my second term.

Mr. MCKINLEY. But you had not done so before being elected the first time.

Mr. SCOTT. No, sir.

Mr. MCKINLEY. You were boasting of the immense majority you had in 1884, when Mr. Blaine was a candidate.

Mr. SCOTT. No. The gentleman from Ohio said that I was elected in an "off year." I replied that I had been a Democrat all my life, and that in a Presidential campaign, when Mr. Blaine carried my district by 6,000 majority, I was elected by a majority of 900; and at the next election, after I had voted for the Morrison bill, I carried the district by double the majority that I had received before. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MCKINLEY. What I cannot understand is this: If the gentleman's district believes in free-trade and is against protection, how did it happen to give 6,000 majority for Mr. Blaine? [Applause.]

Go back to the people and ask to be returned on this bill and the President's message; do not dodge or equivocate, but stand up to the issue squarely, make your platform in Connecticut the same as in the Carolinas, in New York and New Jersey, the same as Mississippi and Georgia; and then if your majority is returned you will be commissioned to adopt this bill or something like unto it, abandoning the American for the British policy. [Applause.] The details at this time can be of little moment. This bill points to the overthrow of the protective system; that is its tendency and mission.

It is the system which is on trial; not one item or one schedule of the tariff, but the principle upon which the whole rests. Nothing which that side of the House can do or will do touching the tariff can be other than hurtful. If it corrected a single abuse or inequality or incongruity it will be at the expense and sacrifice of many great interests. It is destruction, not correction you are after. When your bill levels at all it levels down. When it equalizes articles belonging to the same group and family, representing the same raw material and the same amount of labor, its equality is with the lowest. It does not help that which bears the lowest duty, but destroys that which bears the highest. It injures the whole that it may put the whole upon the same footing. It gives no consideration or protection to a single home industry or American product, except probably cotton and rice. It puts no languishing American industry on its feet; it sets in motion no idle spindles; it starts no new fires; it creates no increased demand for labor; if an industry is down it keeps it there, its very breath is paralyzation, it injures what it touches and touches that it may injure. [Great applause.]

If the tariff needs revision—and in some particulars revision would improve it—it must be done by its friends and in full recognition of the principle of protection. It must be done by a party with courage enough to raise duties if needed and reduce them if unnecessarily, and with wisdom enough to foresee and provide against redundant revenue, and in correcting inequalities prudent enough to inflict no injury upon any, but bring good to all. That is the correction of inequalities to which the Republican party pledged itself in its national platform of 1884, and for the fulfillment of which it has not since then had a majority in the House to enforce. If it had it would have long ago been done. It will do it when it is again in control. Not correction which destroys, but which makes simple, harmonious, and equitable all of the provisions of the tariff.

It is fortunate that our Government is founded upon the consent of the governed, that every citizen has a voice in making and unmaking the House of Representatives every two years, and even if he is deprived in the interim of a hearing there is one day when he can speak and vote and make his influence felt [applause]; for I tell you, Mr. Chairman, if the workmen were without the ballot we would have free trade within twelve months, and their protests and ours would be as idle as the wind which none of us heed. Fortunately for them they have a vote, and if they fail to use it for their homes, and their firesides, and their families they will show much less manhood, independence, intelligence, and righteous resentment than I am sure they possess. It was the ballot in the hands of labor to be used next November which kept coal and iron ore from being placed on the free-list in this bill, and unless the majority is reversed in this body and the Fifty-first Congress placed under Republican control these products, with others of equal importance, will be stricken from the dutiable and placed upon the free-list. This is only the initial step. The chairman of the committee has so declared. Listen to his words found in his opening speech:

We should lay taxes to obtain revenue, but not restrict importations. * * * We should place every material of manufacture on the free-list. * * *

This is the proclamation made by the premier of this body; this is in direct line with the President's message; this is the plan, the policy, and the purpose of the Democratic party. The elections once safely over, the party now in control again invested with power, and the work will go on to the end. The Democratic patriots and protectionists must get out of the way. Even Democrats who believe that protection is "a local issue," and as such worth maintaining, must not further interrupt the procession. You saw an exhibition of the spirit this morning [laughter], when the generous courtesy of my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] saved his party from a most unfortunate embarrassment. The hope of the country, Mr. Chairman, is in the ballot. The future, and, as I conceive, the welfare and progress of the Republic, the future condition of the wage-earners depends upon the issue to be settled in November. American citizens who love their country must be on guard on that day of supreme concern; it is their day, their one great opportunity. Parties must be subordinated to the great interests of the masses. No party necessity is great enough to force its adherents against its country's best interests. I care not what in the future may be the party name which stands for this system, which stands for the people, I will follow its flag under whatever designation or leadership, because it is my country's flag and represents its greatness and its glory.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I conclude and thank you for your kind attention and for the generous indulgence of the House. [Long and continued applause, and cries of "Vote!"]

I desire to print in the RECORD a letter received from the Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers:

PITTSBURGH, PA., May 14, 1888.

DEAR SIR: We respectfully ask you to submit to the Fiftieth Congress the following statement of the importations of iron and steel for the year ending June 30, 1887, and its relation to labor. The quantities imported are of various grades, and the calculations made are for the number of men that could have been employed in and about our rolling mills had that amount of iron and steel been manufactured in the United States:

The items have been taken from the Report of Commerce and Navigation for 1887. It has been estimated as near as could be done to give a fair average of the number of men in each item that it would require directly at the furnaces and trains of rolls to make the amount of iron and steel as enumerated in the following clauses:

First. The amount of scrap imported was 261,268 tons. If this amount had not been brought over, and had been made out of pig-iron into muck bar in our mills it would have given employment to about seventeen hundred and forty puddlers and helpers, each day of three hundred days in a year. It would also have given employment to many others at the muck rolls rolling it into bars before it could be used at the finishing trains and worked into finished product ready for the market. The number of men herein specified does not include the miners of ore and coal or those employed at blast furnaces, foundries, machine shops, etc., which are necessary in order to make this material.

Second. Bar and structural iron and steel, also billets, slabs, blooms, and ingots imported during the year amounted to about 275,000 tons. This would have given employment to at least 1,000 men per day in and about steel mills in getting it in shape for the different departments that make it ready for the market, or into a merchantable article. Again, it would require and give employment to fifteen hundred men working in the iron mills in which the iron and steel is reworked and made into a finished article. This is in addition to the one thousand already mentioned.

Third. The importation of cotton-ties, hoops, bands, and scolls of iron and steel was in the neighborhood of 19,800 tons. This amount would have given employment to two hundred and fifty men per day, at three hundred days per year.

The cotton-ties especially have given cause to considerable trouble among the men employed in mills making a specialty of cotton ties. Because of the ad valorem rate of 35 per cent. we have almost every year to contend with a reduction in the price per ton of the imported article that caused prices to be established here from which the American manufacturer and workingman suffered alike. The Mills bill provides that cotton-ties be placed on the free-list. We positively object, as such action will deprive our workmen of the opportunity of making the limited amount of cotton-ties they now make, and in addition, it will very materially injure our hoop-iron trade. When cotton-ties were admitted under a specific duty, the unit of value was a fraction over 2 cents per pound. Since the introduction of the ad valorem rate, the unit of value has declined every year, until now it is 1.2 cents per pound.

Fourth. Plates, sheets, and corrugated iron and steel was imported in various forms amounting to about 23,300 tons. That amount would have given work to three hundred men each day of three hundred days in the year, and, as already stated, to many others in preparing the material from which sheets and plates are manufactured. Sheet steel, we understand, has been imported during the past year at 45 per cent. ad valorem. We claim that this is a gross injustice on our steel workers, as the duty on sheet steel should be no less than that on sheet iron of the same sizes. We claim that ad valorem rates should be eliminated from the lists of imports, as it admits of undervaluations and fraud. You need no further proof of this than the fact that 30 gauge sheet iron is admitted at a lower rate than the heavier gauges, yet the cost of production of the former exceeds that of the latter.

Fifth. Wire rods, nails, screws, and wire in various shapes was imported to the amount of about 150,000 tons. This amount would have given employment to at least thirty-seven hundred men per year.

Sixth. Nuts, washers, bolts, and railway fish-plates, or splice-bars, steel tire for railway purposes, including hinge iron and tubes of steel, were imported to the amount of about 50,000 tons, to manufacture which eight hundred men would have been employed three hundred days in a year, had such been manufactured in this country instead of abroad.

The number of men that could have been steadily employed here in making the above amount of products a livelihood for themselves and their families can be readily estimated. Therefore, should the Mills bill pass, which provides for a still further reduction of duties on iron and steel, it would certainly augment the importation of such manufactured articles, and would therefore cause more idleness and suffering among the working classes, who have already been affected since the measure was introduced in the present session of Congress.

There was also imported over 49,500 tons of iron and steel rails. The Mills bill proposes to take off the present duty $6 per ton, thereby leaving the duty only $11 per ton. Taking into consideration the amount that was imported, such a reduction as proposed by the bill would have a tendency to still further increase importations, and would be the cause of throwing hundreds of more men into idleness that are merely getting a living now in the mills manufacturing rails.

The 49,500 tons would have given at least five hundred men employment for the entire year in addition to those producing the material to make the same into rails.

In the foregoing statement we have dealt with none in a numerical sense, except those directly employed in and about rolling mills and steel works. We have not included the millions who are benefited by the product of our labor, not the least of whom is the farmer. Our hard-earned earnings ramify through them all—the grocer, butcher, baker, broker, lawyer, insurance agent, real estate agent, banker, merchant, in fact every kind of business derives a benefit from the brawn and muscle of the physical laborer—and any reduction therefrom means a corresponding reduction all around.

Again, we desire to call your attention to the manufacture of tinned plates.

The Mills bill places tin-plates on the free-list. Whatever professions of friendship and partiality to American labor the majority of the Ways and Means Committee may have made, this act of theirs in placing tin-plates on the free-list clearly indicates their real intentions of ultimate free-trade. It is an act solely and absolutely in the interest of British capital and labor, securing to them a monopoly of tin-plate manufacture needed to supply the needs and wants of the American people. It is an act that implies the inability of American labor to produce tin-plates, or that it is better to employ British labor at low wages to supply us with tin plates, rather than permit the same to be done by home labor at reasonable wages.

It is unnecessary that we should enter here into the history of the tin-plate question in this country. Suffice it to say that although strenuous ttempts were made between 1872 and 1878 to establish tin-plate manufacture in this country, all failed for lack of proper encouragement by the Government. A protective tariff was never enforced for the purpose of promoting tin-plate manufacture here.

British manufacturers, though possessing a monopoly of tin-plate manufacture since 1720, never supplied cheap tin-plates to this country until attempts to manufacture tin-plates were made here. In 1875 we had four tin-plate works in operation in this country. Prices of British tin-plates were very high up to that date. Quoting from the Iron Age, we find the prices to have been, in 1875, for ordinary coke grades, $12 per box, and for charcoal grades $14.75 per box. A box contained 112 sheets of 14 by 20, and weighed about 112 pounds. It was the high prices that had existed up to this time that tempted American capital to undertake tin-plate manufacturing. The duty at that time was 15 per cent. ad valorem. In 1875 the duty was made specific, 1.1 cents per pound; but it was only a low revenue duty, equal to about 15 per cent. ad valorem. The British manufacturers finding that the attempts to manufacture tin-plates in this country were successful rapidly reduced prices, and by the aid of cheap labor and a low tariff in 1878 completely throttled the young American industry. Since this little episode took place we have had an era of low prices and an extremely poor quality of tin-plates.

As workingmen we reason that if British manufacturers were enabled to throttle this young industry by the aid of a low revenue tariff, that the same results would follow in bars, sheets, structural, and all other forms of iron and steel manufacture, had we not a protective duty.

The low revenue tariff on tin-plates, which also includes terne plates, have furthermore been very injurious to our sheet-iron and steel industry. For several years the imported tin and terne plates have been steadily displacing home productions of sheets of the finer grades, particularly galvanized and leaded sheets in several directions. In the roofing business the quantity of home-produced sheet-iron has fallen off within the last six years nearly one-half. If these results have followed from a low tariff, what may we expect to follow in the wake of free tin-plates? It is reasonable to presume nothing less than the complete annihilation of the sheet-iron and steel business in all the finer grades.

The arguments used by a majority of the Ways and Means Committee in favor of free tin-plates seem to us very illogical and impracticable. They make but one point, to wit: Cheaper cans to promote the export trade in canned goods. This is ridiculous, as the law now provides a drawback of 90 per cent off of the duty to the exporter. The remaining 10 per cent. affects the price of a dozen 3-pound cans of salmon about 1 cent. Just imagine an item of 1 cent per dozen cans of salmon giving the exporter such an advantage in the foreign market as would effectually overcome all competition.

The majority report does not show that free tin plates would be any advantage to the home consumer of canned goods. Nor can canners expect any advantage, as the tax is not paid by them, but by the consumer of canned goods. For this reason we fail to comprehend why canners are agitating lower duties on tin plates or free tin plates.

Importers and such large users of tin plates as the Standard Oil Company are naturally in favor of free tin-plates. There are quite a number of importers who are interested as owners of the tin-plate works—Henry, Nash & Co., Bond & Parsons, Sims & Coventry, Taylor Brothers, Phelps, Dodge & Co., and others. We readily admit that to these free tin-plates would be quite an advantage.

British manufacturers would also expect to realize some benefit from the free tin-plates. For over eight years they have been constantly complaining of the low price of tin-plates in the United States. It must be observed that the agitation for a protective tariff and home production of tin-plates has had its moral effect, in a large measure at least, of keeping down the price of the article in our markets. Let free trade in tin-plates be established, and the agitation in favor of protection and home production ceases. It is but natural to suppose that British manufacturers, finding themselves absolutely masters of the situation, will so materially advance prices to a point at least satisfactory to themselves.

It is therefore evident to our minds that the real beneficiaries of free tin-plates would be the foreign producers of the article, foreign merchants, and importers.

To the American workingman and chief consumer no material benefit whatever would accrue. On the other hand as wage-earners our workingmen would be greatly injured. In the name of the iron and steel workers, we therefore protest against the action of the majority of the Ways and Means Committee in placing tin-plates on the free-list, or against any reduction in the present duty.

We go further, and earnestly petition Congress to seriously meditate as to the advisability of placing a protective duty on tin-plates, a duty commensurate with the higher labor cost in this country; thus securing employment to American labor, in the production of tin-plates, at wages in harmony with those now existing in our iron and steel manufactories.

For the purpose of fully demonstrating this matter we submit herewith a cost sheet, showing comparative cost of production of tin-plates in this country and Great Britain. We have taken great care in preparing this cost sheet, and as it is a new feature in the presentation of this subject we hope you will give it careful study and consideration.

The effect of placing a protective duty on tin-plate will not have the effect, as some people argue, of raising the price in proportion to the increase in duty. The increase in price will be really immaterial. It should be observed that under our present system of having all our tin plates manufactured abroad, that a large expense is incurred between manufacturer and consumer. This, with home production, would be absorbed in higher wages to labor.

The value at the port of export of the tin-plates imported during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, was $16,883,813. The average price of tin-plates for last year, paid by the American consumers, not including the Standard Oil Company, and a few other large corporations, was about 5.2 cents per pound. Our total importation last year would thus indicate a value of nearly $30,000,000.

The cost of production of the tin-plates, according to the cost sheet we submit, would be $15,877,623, in Great Britain, and in this country $28,267,982. This indicates that with home production the price to the consumer would be advanced but very little over present rates.

The advantages to the home market, however, would be immense. The total wages paid to British labor in the manufacture of tin-plates imported last year was about $8,991,468. American wages for same amount of work would be $23,352,875.

This increase in employment furnished to labor would more than remove the glut in the labor market. It would create such a demand for labor as to give employment to every idle iron and steel worker in the country.

It would also stimulate labor in the production of coal, iron, ore, coke, limestone, and other materials. The 254,751 gross tons of tin-plates represent 870,000 tons of iron ore, 300,000 tons of limestone, 1,800,000 tons of coal and coke, 300,000 tons of pig-iron, 5,000,000 pounds of lead, 25,000,000 pounds of tin, 12,000,000 pounds of tallow or palm-oil, 35,000,000 pounds of sulphuric acid, 11,000,000 feet of lumber, fire-brick, clay, oils and lubricants, hemp, etc.

It would require sixty-eight large works of five trains of rolls each, involving an outlay of over $30,000,000 capital, and giving employment to about 24,000 workmen in the rolling-mills alone, who would earn at least $12,000,000 per annum.

Comparative cost of the manufacture of black plate of ordinary quality in iron or steel at a Welsh tin-plate works, and the like at an American works, at wage rates paid in each country.

[In Great Britain there are 94 works, with a capacity of 376 mills, or 4 mills to each works. English works make 30 boxes per day, Welsh works 35 and 40 boxes. Weekly average per mill, 11 turns, 400 boxes. Total for 4 mills, 1,600 boxes per week, or 80,000 boxes in a year, 17 boxes to the ton.]

We could elaborate on this subject still more, but we feel that we are encroaching upon your valuable time. What is herein given we can substantiate. Our people are no theorists in their line. They are men who by dint of hard physical labor (labor that has made it possible to encircle this country with a complete network of iron and steel), energy, experience, suffering, and hardships have become thoroughly practical. Our condition as workingmen is such that requires legislation—for our betterment, not for our detriment, which the passage of the Mills bill will make possible. Some will argue that our employers will reduce our wages anyway, even though the tariff remains as it is. We ask you to leave that to us, and we will endeavor to take care of ourselves. As is customary in all branches of business, even among lawyers, we have our little family quarrels, but we dislike outsiders to interfere in the settlement thereof.

We mean no disrespect to any one when we say that we look upon this yearly agitation of the tariff as a menace to our business, though, perhaps, unintended.

As an organization we have strenuously and persistently opposed any concerted political action. We never have and do not now owe allegiance to any political party. We know neither Republicans, Democrats, Greenbackers, Prohibitionists, Union Labor, or any other known political party in the United States. In the opening ceremony in our lodge meetings we forbid "the introduction of any subject of a political nature." We simply quote this to show that we have never dabbled in politics as an organization.

We have never contributed $1 or 1 cent toward electing or defeating any party or any man, and we ask Congress not to force us into that position by passing a bill that will undoubtedly jeopardize our wages. While every member in our organization is free to and does exercise his political preference, we are protectionists and have unanimously declared ourselves such as an organization at almost every recurring annual convention.

All parties directly or indirectly interested in or against protection were refused hearings before the Ways and Means Committee, and we have no method of reaching the ears of the members of Congress only in this way. We therefore submit this statement through you, and ask for it a respectful hearing to the end that we may be allowed through the medium of protection against foreign competition to maintain decent living wages.

Accompanying this, please find a copy of our "scale of prices" for reference in case of dispute.

Yours respectfully, and on behalf of the iron and steel workers,

WILLIAM WEIHE,
President.
WILLIAM MARTIN,
Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM MCKINLEY, Jr.,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, when Congress assembled last December there had been purchased all of the bonds which were necessary to complete the required sum for the sinking fund for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888. There had accumulated in the Treasury a surplus of about $55,000,000, and the daily sum collected by taxation was about $1,000,000, so that it was estimated that the surplus remaining unexpended on July 1, 1888, would be not less than $150,000,000. The Forty-eighth and the Forty-ninth Congresses had refused to consider any act reducing taxation; and the Secretary of the Treasury was not willing, under the act of March 3, 1881, to purchase bonds not required for the sinking fund.

When the Committee on Ways and Means was announced, on January the 5th, it necessarily had to confront this condition of affairs and attempt to frame a bill which would so reduce the revenues of the Government as to bring its legitimate expenses and its revenues close together; and this, too, in such a way as to reduce the burden of taxation upon the people. It recognized that the revenues could be reduced by raising the duties to a prohibitory standard—but this only increased the burdens of taxation.

The repeal of the entire internal-revenue law would also reduce the revenue to a point where there might be an annual deficit of $20,000,000; but this deficit could not work harm for the present, as the surplus remaining on June 30, 1888, would be sufficient to comply with the requirements of the sinking fund until 1891, when the four-and-a-halfs fall due. But no large section of the American people really favored a plan which removed taxation from spirits, beer, and tobacco, and left the necessaries of life burdened; nor was the committee willing, in the assorting of taxes and in the attempt to give substantial relief from the present unnecessary taxation, to adopt a plan which did not light a single furnace, cause a single wheel to revolve, give to labor a single day's wage, remove from commercial activity any burden, nor from the manufacturer any annoyance. This plan simply took from the public Treasury that amount of taxes which were voluntarily paid in a mode which distributed those taxes equally, impartially, and not by burdens upon the necessities of life.

Rejecting, therefore, the proposition to increase the duties for the purpose of reducing the revenues of the Government and increasing the revenues of the manufacturers, and the proposition to repeal the internal-revenue system, the committee attempted to frame a bill which would reduce the revenues by a safe amount, and would relieve, as far as a moderate bill could do, the evils of the present unequal system; reform the inequalities of the present tariff, and promote American industry by giving to American labor the hope of a permanent, stable, and profitable market. It recognized that a system which had been in existence for over a quarter of a century could not be hastily nor recklessly overturned. It desired to harm no industry. It constantly leant in favor of the established rates of duty, and in case of doubt proposed a rate which it believed to be entirely safe.

No one can appreciate more than we that the bill reported by us does not answer all the conditions of to-day; that many duties are left at a rate entirely too high; that the relief which ought to be given has not been granted to the extent which the condition of the country and of labor required; but I venture to affirm that under all the circumstances which surrounded us—trying to perform an onerous public duty with an eye single to the public good—we have reported a bill which every fair-minded man in America may accept as wise, moderate, and proper legislation. And upon this statement, for one, I am willing to go to the country and to submit to its judgment. [Applause on the Democratic side].

And here it may not be improper to notice the personal criticism on this committee by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

With a wit which was equaled by the courtesy and much greater than the desire for accuracy exhibited, the gentleman from Michigan insinuated, what he would not be reckless enough to directly assert, that not only was the bill reported not prepared by the Committee on Ways and Means which reported it, but that,

When pressed upon this point, there was no member of the majority so lost to all sense of personal pride as to admit the parentage.

And this statement is introduced with the assertion of the gentleman that—

It would be no violation of the secrets of the committee-room to state that.

I trust that it is within the most rigorous bounds of parliamentary language to say that this is absolutely without foundation; in its length, breadth, height, depth, and thickness it is a creation of the gentleman's fancy, except that he violated no secrets of the committee-room in making the statement; what he violated I leave to him to determine. [Applause and laughter].

At no meeting in that committee-room or elsewhere, at no time or place, in no manner whatever has the majority of that committee ever given any one any pretence to say that it denied its responsibility for this bill, or that any one but the members of that majority was in any degree whatever responsible for it.

Of course any bill not in whole or in part prepared by the gentleman from Michigan would fail to meet his approbation, for it is the pleasing belief of gentlemen of his opinion that they alone are competent to prepare tariff bills; and if it were possible for Job to return and ask that olden question which puzzled the depth and the sea, "Where shall wisdom be found, and where is the place of understanding?" the modest gentleman from Michigan, either alone or in company with some of his colleagues, would feel constrained by the irresistible sense of duty and of fitness to rise and with downcast eye but firm demeanor and hand resting on his manly breast answer, "here!" [Great laughter and applause on the Democratic side].

There need be no denial on the part of the minority of the committee of complicity in the preparation of any bill reducing the amount of bonus paid by the tax-payer and consumer to the favored beneficiaries of class legislation. It goes without the saying that they are guiltless of such offense. And it is true that in the preparation of this bill we did not hope to meet their wishes, receive their approbation, or find their support of the provisions agreed on by us. We disagree in toto cælo. We believe that taxation is a sovereign power to be used only to the extent of public necessity and for governmental purposes; they believe it ought to be used for private interests and the promotion of private gain.

With us the burden of proof is on him who seeks to insert rates of duties in a tax bill to demonstrate that the revenue is necessary and that the tax is a proper one; they believe that the burden is on the tax-payer to demonstrate that no private profit will be lost by removing a public tax. With such opposite views it is the merest folly to suppose that it were possible for that committee to agree upon a tax bill.

But it is proper that this House and the country should know, what I doubt not is known, that this bill was the result of great labor, of an earnest desire to reach a fair and conservative compromise measure; and that every item of it underwent the scrutiny of every member of the majority of the committee. As a whole it is a compromise of independent and earnest opinions of earnest men bent on practical legislation. [Applause].

It does not pretend to change a system, to set aside the present system and substitute in lieu of it another and different system. It leaves the average rates of duty higher than they were under the Morrill tariff, and it is a protective-tariff bill. The committee did not believe that it was its duty to do more than to propose a moderate reduction of taxation by increasing the free-list, reducing certain rates, and removing as far as practicable unnecessary restrictions, and to make an effort to render the administration of the law more efficient to the protection of honest importers and the detection and prevention of fraud.

Whatever views any one may hold as to the proper theory on which a tariff bill ought to be framed, those views are not violated by this bill. We do not pretend that it is a scientific measure. The present law is very highly protective—in some instances prohibitory. He who believes that protection ought to be the main object and revenue only incidental may find it to his interest to accept so moderate an offer as is now made; he who thinks that in raising the revenues such incidental protection ought to be given as is practicable will find in the provisions of this proposition, when he examines them carefully, that his support of this measure would be consistent with his opinions. While men of my views, content with trying to accomplish what is practicable and patiently watching the fair experiment of reducing taxation and increasing the free-list by putting thereon raw material, accept the practical and give our support. It is a bill framed to meet the present condition, not to fit any particular theory.

The bill reported affects the schedules under which there were importations during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, to the value of $258,208,157.11, on which were collected $139,852,632.62 of duties, and it is estimated that the aggregate reduction of duties caused by the changes proposed in this bill will amount to $53,720,447.22. This estimate is, of course, conjectural. The reduction of rates sometimes produces increased importations, and in certain articles affected by the proposed changes this may occur. So, too, increase of population brings increase of consumption, and larger importations are needed to supply this increased demand. On the contrary, it is believed that this bill will enable the home manufacturer of woolen and other textile fabrics to so equally compete with his foreign competitor as to supply the home market with much of what is now supplied by importation, and that this will continue until the foreign goods of certain characters will be entirely driven from the American market.

We have no doubt that with the superior skill, intelligence, and machinery under the control of our manufacturers, that all that is necessary to secure for them the home market is that they shall be put on equal terms with the foreign competitor. We have kept steadily in view the fundamental principle of all true national growth—that there is no hostility between the man who produces the material out of which the fabrics must be made, the labor by which the change from raw material to finished product is accomplished, the manufacturer under whose supervision and by means of whose capital this change is made, and the consumer for whose benefit and at whose cost all this is done. Inextricably intermingled, there are no classes under a proper and natural system of development.

The changes proposed by this bill are designed to give to the farmer by whom all provisions are raised a market for his breadstuffs and for raw materials, which is only profitable when he has a prosperous manufacturer for a purchaser; to the laborer, the hope of a constant market; and to the manufacturer, freedom from unnecessary burdens. We have, therefore, put upon the free-list, as far as we felt it was just, the materials necessary for the manufacturer. We have reduced the rates, wherever we have touched them, to a point that gives to the home consumer the hope of fair competition whenever a demand may be made by an internal trust to advance the prices beyond a fair consideration for the article to be sold, and yet we have left the rates so that the protection afforded is greater than any necessity, and makes all competition of foreign manufactures upon terms of great advantage to the American manufacturer. We do not believe there is a single instance in the bill where the duty left upon an article is not more than the difference between the cost of production in America and the cost of production abroad, plus the freight. When the bill is examined in detail, I think this will be found to be true, and I remit the discussion of the details of the bill until it be taken up, item by item, under the five-minute rule.

But I will illustrate that this is accurate by a mere reference to the cotton schedule:

The last authoritative compilation and analysis concerning the cotton manufacturing interest of the United States was prepared by Mr. Edward Atkinson, an eminent practical expert, as the agent of the Tenth Census.

In the census year the cotton-mills of the United States consumed 1,570,344 bales of cotton, which cost $55.39 a bale, and sold the product at the rate of $122.32 per bale, the aggregate cost of the cotton being $86,925,725, and of other material $15,260,622, and the aggregate proceeds of the product were $192,090,110.

The mills paid $42,040,510 for the services of operatives and all other employés. The cost of labor was 21.28 per cent. of the value of the product, and 41.13 per cent. of the value of the cotton and all other raw material consumed.

The cost of the raw material of all kinds and wages was $144,246,857, and the product was sold for $192,090,110, leaving a credit balance of $52,156,747, which seems to include, though not so stated, the cost of insurance, interest, and selling, as those items are not charged in the account balance-sheet.

The cost of labor was 21.28 per cent.; the proposed duty is from 35 to 40 per cent., being from 175 to almost 200 per cent. on the labor. But, in addition to this enormous advantage, the English manufacturer has to pay freight on the cotton exported from America, which is about 12 per cent. on the material, and freight on his finished product, which is 12 per cent. on the fabric, and it is fair to estimate this double freight at 18 per cent. To this must be added the double marine insurance and the additional cost of the increased handlings necessary, and to this the increased productivity of the American laborer.

The rates proposed and the changes recommended ought to meet the approval of the gentlemen from Massachusetts, for they are even higher than those advocated by Henry Wilson and approved by Charles Sumner in 1857 (Globe, Thirty-fourth Congress, third session, volume 35, page 343), and of the gentlemen from Ohio, for they are far above what Senator SHERMAN declared in 1867 (Globe, volume 63, part 3, appendix, page 71, second session of Thirty-ninth Congress) was sufficient. Let me submit to the distinguished Representative from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] what his no less distinguished Senator then said—

We must now protect American manufacturers, not merely against foreign competition, but also against the effect of our own laws. This is really all the protection they now need.

* * * If you reduce their products to a specie basis, and put them on the same footing they were on before the war, the present rates of duty would be too high. It would not be necessary for scarce any branch of industry to be protected to the extent of your present tariff law.

They do not ask protection against the pauper labor of Europe, but they ask protection against the violation of your own laws. These are our paper currency and our internal taxation.

You have repealed every burden imposed on the manufacturer under the internal taxation except as to alcohol, and we are on a specie basis; and yet you asseverate, with a display of intense passion, that a bill proposing changes so much more moderate is, in its conception British, in its design unpatriotic, and in its effects fatal. Gentlemen, how do you expect the country to believe that you are sincere when they contrast your utterances with those of the statesmen who were your leaders?

It was determined, in response to what seemed to be the sentiment of a large part of the country, to propose the repeal of taxes on manufactured tobacco. For practical statesmanship is the art of wise compromise, and in a free country the desire and judgment of a large portion of the people whom we represent must be accepted as a sufficient reason for legislation.

In the twenty-five years in which the internal-revenue system has been in force certain statutes have been found to admit of an administration which is oppressive and irritating. The committee have thought it wise to repeal so much of these statutes as were not necessary to the proper administration of the system and the collection of the revenue under it. We propose the repeal of special retail licenses, the revenues from which we do not need, which licenses we do not believe to be necessary to the administration of the law and the collection of the remaining revenues, and which are a continual source of oppression and irritation, as is shown by the fact that more than 50 per cent. of all the prosecutions in the Federal courts are for the alleged violation of those provisions of the statute which are proposed to be repealed.

It is also proposed to give to the Secretary of the Treasury the discretion to make an experiment as to whether the revenues upon distilled spirits may be collected in a simpler and less expensive manner than under the present statute—as to whether the army of office-holders required by the present system can not be either greatly curtailed or wholly discharged. It is not made mandatory upon him, because the committee was not willing to force the Executive to try this experiment, but they did desire not only that he should have the opportunity so to do but that he should take advantage thereof. The present system is largely based upon the hypothesis that every one who manufactures spirits, beer, or tobacco is dishonest, and is to be watched as if he were intent upon defrauding the Government. It is believed that a system ought to be, and can be devised based upon precisely the opposite hypothesis, and this law permits the Secretary to make an experiment with the smaller distilleries if he chooses so to do.

There were reasons which made the committee examine with the utmost care whether it is practicable to exempt fruit brandies and alcohol used in the arts from taxation without destroying the legitimate distillation of taxed spirits; and no provision could be framed which seemed satisfactory—no provision that practically exempted these spirits on the one hand and yet was at all just to those who obeyed the law as to other spirits, or secured the collection of the revenue on the spirits taxed. Our belief was that to exempt fruit brandies and alcohol used in the arts was indirectly and hypocritically, but effectually, to destroy the internal-revenue system; and if this is to be done we preferred to do it or have it done openly, and thus fix the responsibility for it upon those who accomplished it. Those who vote to exempt alcohol thus used will do so with the knowledge that it is a vote to destroy the tax on distilled spirits.

The aggregate amount of reduction is estimated to be $78,176,054.22, taken in nearly the proportion of 2 to 1 from tariff taxation and internal-revenue taxation.

This reduction, of course, does not affect the surplus now in the Treasury. As to that the policy which the committee has desired to be pursued, and which under the bill reported by it and amended in the Senate, and under the resolution passed by this House on the 16th of April, has been inaugurated by the Secretary of the Treasury since this discussion began, is that the payment of the public debt with the surplus which has accumulated, and which will continue to accumulate, ought to be the settled policy of the Government. And as to the future the reduction of taxation by the removal of burdens through a revision of the tariff is the policy through which alone the Democratic party can hope to retain the confidence of the country.

The bill is before Congress; the responsibility of its preparation was upon us; the responsibility of legislation is upon you. No sneers as to its authors; no charges, however offensive or discourteous, as to the manner of its preparation; no abuse of those who were concerned in its preparation can remove from you the responsibility of action nor change the issue made by the bill itself. The surplus continues to grow; the evil effects of it are daily exhibited; schemes without number to squander the public money, to distribute it among the States, to cultivate a habit in the American people of looking to Washington as a great alms-giver can be defeated only by your action as to this bill. And it is no answer to say that it was prepared in secrecy, that its authors are incompetent, that there was impropriety in the mode of its consideration. Neither your own consciences nor the country will acquit you if you shirk the responsibility and evade the issue under such excuse. Nor will it be accepted as any answer that there was any provision of any sort in the Confederate constitution, or that the gentlemen engaged in the preparation of this bill were on one side or the other side during that great strife, or that certain States have lagged behind in the progress of national growth. It might as well be understood that what we do and say here is done and said in view of the American people, who are in dead earnest concerning this matter.

It has been reported that in some savage tribes, out of the bones of the dead, implements of various sorts were made; but in this debate it has occurred to gentlemen so eminent as to be distinguished representatives of the people to deliberately dig up the bones of the heroes of the great war and out of them make dice, and loaded dice at that, to play in this game of politics. In such a game, even with such dice, the gentleman using them may rest assured that they will lose. The American people are in no humor either to witness or approve such proceedings.

The venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania may also be assured that no criticism he may permit himself to make upon Kentucky will be held to be any answer to the bill under consideration, or any excuse for refusal to give relief to the people, overburdened by excessive taxation and looking to this Congress for some wise legislation. Kentucky can bear with serenity both the commendation and the condemnation of that venerable gentleman, and I beg him to remember that no matter what he may feel called upon to say, he will again be welcome to our hospitality, which will be as generously afforded to him as it has heretofore been; for in his old age we will not remember, if he comes among us, that garrulity which has led him to say things the utterance of which can only harm him and which Kentucky can both forgive and forget.

If the tariff be such a stimulus, if under its operation only prosperity and progress are possible, then the question that he asks—why Kentucky is a laggard—is indeed a mysterious and unanswerable conundrum. If it be equal and just in its operation it becomes a still more mysterious problem, but if it be a carefully-devised system by which those sections which happened to be older and more developed and with larger accumulated capital obtained all the advantages under it, and made all other sections tributary to their gain and profit, then the question, if the implication contained in it were true, is of easy answer. You have obtained by the operation of an unjust law the surplus money which our fields and our mines and our labor have produced. Forced to purchase from you at prices which were wholly beyond the value of the articles purchased, debarred from the markets where we could buy the cheapest, and compelled to sell much of our product in the markets where we had to sell the cheapest, we have been laborers for your benefit; and it is scarcely becoming for you to ask of us why we have not prospered, when your cities have been partly built on our labor and your charities come from exactions laid upon our shoulders.

But while it is true that, relatively, these manufacturing States have grown unequally wealthy, I am confident that they are not as wealthy as they would have been if Carolina and Georgia had not voted for protection in 1816, or Webster had won in the great battle of 1824. The aggregate wealth would have been so much more that their just share thereof would be more than their unjust share under the protection system. It has been a giant moving upwards, but burdened and manacled. The flight has been that of the eagle, but an eagle weighted and trammeled. We took the wrong road in 1824, and surrendered the easy mastery of the world and the unrivaled supremacy of the seas.

It is not, however, true in the sense in which the gentleman asks it, that Kentucky has been laggard. Under the apportionment in 1870 she obtained one additional Representative on this floor, and again, under the apportionment of 1880, she obtained another. From 1870 to 1880, Kentucky increased in population nearly 24 per cent.; Pennsylvania nearly 22 per cent., and New England a little over 15 per cent., so that in spite of unequal laws her growth has been steady, homogeneous, and prosperous, without jealousy of any sister State, and with kindly regard for all sections.

It is true that we have not imported contract labor from Hungary to mine our coal at a price so small that the duty upon it will pay much more than the cost of the mining, and thereby driven the native population from their homes. It is true that we have not used the laws of the land to induce foreigners to settle among us under such contracts as to force the native laborer to work at starvation prices and thereby give to gentlemen in Kentucky the means to found great libraries, or even write valuable books showing the exploits of that "triumphant democracy" through whose delusions such accumulations became possible.

For the convenience of her citizens Kentucky has divided her territory into numerous counties, and the revenue paid by the citizens of some of these counties do not equal the expenditures needed to be disbursed within those counties, and such counties are called "pauper counties," being, however, not a term of reproach nor of poverty. But I felt a pang of pain when the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania, in his blind attack upon Kentucky, spoke of these "pauper" counties, not on my own account, but for my friends, my Republican colleagues from Kentucky [Messrs. THOMAS, HUNTER, and FINLEY], each of whom lives in one of these "pauper" counties, and in these "pauper" counties resides the Republican strength of Kentucky.

Mr. THOMAS, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman permit me to ask, do not the gentlemen from the First, Second, and Tenth districts represent pauper counties? And are not all of these gentlemen Democrats?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The gentleman refers to Mr. LAFFOON, Mr. TAULBEE, and Mr. STONE. I am glad of it, when it puts my friend in such excellent company.

When that speech is read by the citizens of those counties, who have held in affectionate remembrance the name of my venerable friend, they will think, if they do not say, "Et tu, Brute," and I fear that they will not remember that the last word is in Latin and is a word of two syllables. [Applause.]

The venerable gentleman permits himself to say:

> In the midst of almost unparalleled wealth and general physical advantages the mass of her people are steeped in poverty and illiteracy, and are strangers not only to the comforts of humble life but to the commonest and most absolute daily necessaries of Northern laborers. In 1880 the number of her people above ten years of age who were reported by the census as unable to read and write were more than one-half of her total population. The number was 606,578, while her total population, which of course included those under ten years of age, numbered 1,163,498.

The venerable gentleman, after the speech of my colleague, Governor MCCREARY, corrected the figures, but did not retract the charges founded upon them; statements far more inaccurate than were the figures; a description so grotesque and exaggerated as to excite only pity for him who could deliberately write and deliberately utter it. It is a fair specimen of the accuracy and fairness of one of the fairest defenders of the present system, and of the temper, animus, and taste of the leader of the Republican House. It harms not the State of whom it is recklessly said.

I hope my Republican colleagues from Kentucky will circulate this speech of their leader over their districts which the gentleman attempts to describe; for he expressly declares of that portion of Kentucky in which I reside, and in which Democratic majorities are given:

> Central Kentucky, * * * I may say, is the seat of a more refined and cultivated pastoral community than I have ever been introduced to elsewhere, unless it was in the southern counties of England.

I know not whether the anonymous writers of the extracts read by the gentleman are Kentuckians; if they be, "It is a nasty bird that fouls its own nest."

Mr. Chairman, I venture to submit that in this Congress Kentucky needs no defense; that it is not immodest in her people to hope that her sons in either branch have not been unworthy of her, a fact to which I trust my venerable friend will hereafter feel more like testifying.

But I will not be tempted further; in passing I express the confident belief that the day has gone by when either the passions of the war, denunciations of the whisky ring, abuse of the South, identification of revenue reformers with the Confederate army, or any other of the skillful arts which those interested in the maintenance of this system have heretofore so successfully used, can prevent some action which will be the beginning of a system which is based on the great principle that all tariff legislation should be for the public good and not for private interest.

But I venture to affirm that the gallant Federal soldier who, urged only by a sense of duty, in time of great peril risked his life in retrieving the disaster impending at Shiloh, will hardly be satisfied, when he asks for cheaper clothing and cheaper lumber, to be told that he had fought at Shiloh to settle the question that the Eastern manufacturer had the right to compel the Western consumer to pay such duties as his greed demanded, and that any effort to cheapen the necessities of life by removing therefrom the present exactions would be held to be recognition of the Confederate constitution and the wisdom of that secession. The day has passed when under the old flag, and in the name of loyalty, the sweat of the farmer and the laborer, coined into hard money, can be taken without consideration under the pretense of tariff protection to American labor.

And as I listened to the venerable leader of the House and other eloquent colleagues denouncing the "whisky ring," and pleading in the name of morality for free whisky, and to other gentlemen declaiming with assumed ferocity of manner and exaggeration of rhetorical passion about the late war, the Confederate constitution, and the rebels, I could scarcely repress the hope that the enemies of tariff reform would accept these gentlemen as their leaders, and make up the issue to be tried by the people as they desired. On the one side the payment of the public debt, the reduction of tariff taxation by removing burdens from the necessities of life, and a peaceful rivalry among all sections in building up the future of a united country; on the other side, the squandering of the public money, free whisky, taxed necessities of life to benefit a favored few at the expense of the many, the protection of trusts, and sectional hate.

Representatives of the Republican party, did these gentlemen express your real sentiments? Was the applause with which you greeted their utterances sincere? So be it. We accept the issue, and appeal first to this House to decide, and then to the grand assize of the sovereign people, whose servants we are.

In the year from July 1, 1886, to June 30, 1887, our importations were in value $683,418,981, of which $233,093,639 were free of duty and $450,325,322 dutiable, and the total duty paid was $214,222,310.

Of the importations of last year, $245,587,016, under the classification adopted by the late distinguished Secretary, Mr. McCulloch, were articles in a crude condition which enter into various processes of domestic industry, and articles wholly or partially manufactured for use as materials in manufactures and mechanic arts. The aggregate duty on this sum was $39,961,346. Of this sum $19,567,903 was paid as duty on "articles in a crude condition which enter into the various processes of domestic industry," and $20,393,493 duty on "articles wholly or partially manufactured for use as materials in the manufactures and mechanic arts." This aggregate sum of $39,961,396 is not only the protection paid on his material by the American manufacturer for the benefit of the foreign manufacturer in all the markets of the world, but it is much more. It is that much addition to the cost of production upon which he must make his annual profit.

It is that much added to the burden of the consumer, together with all the embarrassments, annoyances, and expenses arising out of a system which in its administration as well as in its rates opens the door to great frauds as against the honest purchaser and importer, and causes trouble to those who are compelled to use these imported materials. This sum is 10 per cent. profit on $400,000,000, 5 per cent. profit on $800,000,000 of manufactures. But if it be true that the computation of its real burden is the proportion that it bears to the profit of the manufacturer and not to the cost of production of the product, this prevents the production of far more than $800,000,000 worth of manufactures. In many of the mills of New England a profit of one-third of one cent on a yard is an ample return upon the capital invested and employed.

This necessary material which we have to import and upon which this burden of forty millions is imposed is in its added cost rendered too expensive to be used in the production of manufactures where the margin of profit is very small. When to the imported material, estimated last year at $245,587,016, is added the cost of the material, labor, and skill necessary to produce the finished fabric, and to that the necessary cost of handling, transportation, and delivery until the product is actually in the hands of the consumer, the aggregate sum forms a much larger proportion of the seven thousand millions which is estimated to be the annual product of our manufactories than has been ordinarily understood. If it was the last feather that broke the camel's back, the removal of only a very slight part of the precedent load would have enabled that caravan to carry in safety what had been committed to its charge. Every practical man knows that it is not always the largeness of the sum which prevents bankruptcy or which enables him to manufacture in successful competition with his rivals. The mere difference in location, the mere cost of a single as compared with a double handling, the slight advantage in freights, may produce success to one and disaster to another when in all other things as between them there seemed to be equality.

To remove this burden would therefore give a relief far greater than may be calculated by estimating it in relation to the cost of production. It would give new stimulus to many manufactures now languishing—would give profit to many which are now run at a loss, and it would be that small but absolutely necessary sum which marks the difference between profit and loss in the attempt of our manufacturers to compete with the foreign manufacturers in the markets of the world. We talk of subsidies to ships for the purpose of reviving our foreign trade. We spend many millions of dollars a year upon our rivers and harbors for our internal trade so that they may, as far as possible, aid us in our contest for foreign trade. Here is, in its highest sense, a real subsidy that ought to be given to commerce.

To release this forty millions to the producers of America is to enable them to enter on more nearly equal terms with their foreign competitors in all the markets of the world; and as in these latter times it has been discovered that it is the small profit on the large production, and not the large profit on the small production which brings wealth, the larger the output of our factories the cheaper is the cost per unit of production, and the lower therefore the price of the necessities of life to the ultimate consumer.

So, too, this is a direct gift to him who produces in America the materials necessary for our manufactures. The only possible profitable market for him who produces the material upon which more labor and greater skill must be expended to make it useful, is to the manufacturer who is prosperous. It is therefore absolutely necessary that the farmer, who produces such material as comes from the field and stock—the miner and the forest-owner—that we shall adopt such a policy as will give a constant, stable, and profitable market for the material which he must sell in its incomplete state, so that he will be able to buy and pay for the finished product after it has passed through the hands of the manufacturer.

The 265,000,000 pounds of wool raised in America can be turned profitably into the necessaries of life which the wool-raiser must purchase only when he has a wool manufacturer who is prosperous and can therefore afford to purchase his material at a fair price. He who from the bowels of the earth digs ore, or mines coal, or from the mountain side or Southern swamp cuts the timber to which the centuries have given life and vigor, must have, if he can make his labor support those who are dependent upon him, some person who can take these incomplete materials and by added labor and higher skill fit them for the uses to which they were designed, and thereby pay to him a fair price upon which he may always rely, and furnish to him a stable market upon which he may always make his calculations.

The greatest of all products, which in this country must have its daily sale—and that for cash—is labor. Whoever else may retain his goods or wares in barns, or granaries, or warehouses, he who has naught but labor must sell it, and that for cash, so that the daily bread which depends upon the daily wage can be given to those whom God has put upon him to support. Competition can alone furnish a profitable market for labor—that profitable competition which gives life to trade; not that ruinous competition which the stimulus of a forced and unnatural system produces; but the natural competition which grows out of the development of a country and the necessity for a daily supply of its daily wants. This wage-worker demands that we shall frame such a system, if it be within our power to do so, as will furnish twelve months' labor for twelve months' pay. As it is now, whatever other advantage may be claimed for the present system, no fair man will deny that in all the great "protected" industries there can be but seven months of labor, or at least seven months' pay for twelve months' labor, for in seven months when these factories run at their capacity they turn out twelve months' supply for the market they have, so that they give to their operatives the option of seven months' labor, at fair prices for that labor, to secure twelve months' living, or let them work the whole twelve months, but only at such rates as would in the aggregate amount to seven months' pay.

A protective tariff does not, and in the nature of the case can not, fix the wages of labor. Labor, like all commodities, will, under the operation of the law of supply and demand, command its worth in the market where it is for sale; and all that legislation can possibly accomplish is to interfere with the natural operation of this law, and so far as it does this only harm can ensue.

Canada, the United States, and Mexico have protective tariffs, but the price of labor is not uniform in any section of the continent; it differs in every Province of Canada, in almost every State of the United States, and of Mexico.

If there is demand for labor equal to or greater than the supply, then labor is profitably paid; and if combinations of capital to force labor to sell itself at prices fixed by the combination can not be successfully formed, then labor will be free to make its own bargains. But if the market be so restricted that the supply of labor exceeds the demand, or if capital is enabled to combine to prevent competition, then labor must be sold at the price fixed by the employer.

Now, our present system does both—it restricts the market to be supplied by our labor, and it enables the manufacturers to fix the price they will pay to labor. Whenever the duty is high enough to prevent foreign competition, then the operative making and the consumer purchasing those "protected" fabrics are in the power of the manufacturer. No organization of labor, no Knights of Labor, can break such shackles; the "strikes" give only assistance to the "trust," who own the market. The only relief is in Congress by the reduction of duty to the competitive point. We are in morals the partner of every combination rendered possible by the tariff. Who ever desires to dissolve this partnership will support this bill; and per contra, those who wish the "trusts" to continue will oppose any amendment or revision of the present law which could endanger their perpetuation. It is a contest between the revenue reform and the tariff trust party.

It is estimated that there are twenty millions of our citizens engaged in gainful operations. Of these it is a large estimate to say that fifteen hundred thousand can possibly be affected by the reduction of tariff duties; the most careful computation is that 7 per cent. may be thus effected. When you exclude all professional men, who, in one form or another, work for their livelihood; all agricultural laborers; all men who do work which must be done at the place where it is required—which is, by very large odds, the greatest part of other labor required in America than agricultural labor, such as house-building, repairing of all sorts, clothes-making, and the daily labor necessary in every community for its daily wants, which can only be done by persons resident in the community and being part of that community—and the operatives in those industries which are not protected or which do not need protection, the number remaining is not equal, in my judgment, to the number required to produce the exports which we now sell abroad.

If a proper estimate be made of the number of men whose labor is required to produce the cotton, wheat, breadstuffs, and manufactured goods which we export, I have no doubt that it would equal the labor employed in the production of the merchandise claiming protection. I do not know whether any one has attempted to make this calculation. If it be true, as I believe it is, then any system which renders unprofitable this labor can not be defended upon the ground that it renders profitable the labor employed in our protected industries, unless the proportion between them is so great that the country can afford to do without these exports or to export them at a disadvantage. But it is indubitably true that these exports are necessary to our prosperity and credit. We could not stand the drain of gold which would be necessary if our exports were seriously diminished. We hold our position amid the nations of the world now because—I will not say solely, but mainly—of these exports, which furnish to them the food and clothing required by them.

The relief, therefore, of the manufacturer from the payment of this $40,000,000 a year is so much really given to the production of the crude material in America and to the laborer who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow, for it must be remembered that all of this material is absolutely necessary for the successful manufacture of the crude material produced in America. Without it many of our factories would have to be still, and much of the material for which our farmer and mine-owner receive fair prices would become comparatively valueless. From climatic and other reasons there are materials which we absolutely need, but which we can not raise, materials which we must have, and which America either does not produce or produces at such cost as to render the fabric into which it has to be put too expensive for common use. These large importations as a rule—to which, of course, there are some exceptions—add not only to the prosperity of the manufacturer, but are necessary to furnish a market for the product of the material man, and to furnish labor for the wage-earner.

The bill now reported is incomplete in that it does not remove all these burdens. The whole extent to which it does relieve by putting upon the free-list the articles which are on the dutiable list is $22,000,000. It does, however, reduce the burdens as to the other seventeen millions so far as the committee felt that it could do so at present; for some of these articles which are imported and are put under the classification I have indicated come in competition with articles manufactured in America. And the committee has left duties, in some cases altered, and in some unaltered, as in its best judgment the interests of each individual case required, giving the doubt always to the industry which claimed that it could not survive unless duty was left.

The principal items put upon the free-list have been wool and tinned plate, and the real issue between us and our opponents can not be better illustrated than by the different propositions concerning duty on tinned plate. Not one pound of this is made in America; not one pound of it can be used except in helping some other industry; it enters into many of the most important of our native industries. Our fruits, our fish, our vegetables, our meats, our milk, are canned in these tinned plates; it enters into the domestic economy of every housewife. There is hardly any material of which the distribution is so wide and the use so various, and the burden imposed by the tax levied on it so heavy. It will relieve in more ways and to a larger extent more of the minor industries of the country than almost any repeal of tax upon our whole schedule. Its repeal does not injure a single human being; it affects no interest injuriously. No manufacturer has accepted the offer of the Government, indirectly made by putting a duty on tinned plate, to erect a factory where it is made. Its repeal will cause at once great increase in the industries in which it is used. To make tinned plate free and cheapen sugar will at once give to every farmer who has milk now to waste a market in our large cities for condensed milk. Every owner of an orchard where any sort of fruit now goes to rot because its transportation is impossible will find a market for his product. On the other hand, our opponents offer to make the duty on this article absolutely prohibitory. It is an article which must be used, without which we can not get along. To make the duty 2.1 cents per pound necessarily requires either that it shall be imported at this increased cost, which will be some seven millions a year of added burden to the users of it, or that an inferior article at a much higher price shall be temporarily used by being purchased from the American manufacturer, and into his pocket will go not only the duty which is now paid, which is $5,706,433.89, but as much more, being the difference between the present duty, 1 cent, and the proposed duty, 2.1 cents, minus just the margin necessary to undersell the foreign manufacturer and prevent its importation.

So that our opponents, under pretense of reducing the revenue, deliberately propose to take from the American consumer of this necessary article a sum not smaller than $11,000,000, and pay this as a bonus to American manufacturers who already have a protection so large as to be able to make an association which does not hesitate to enter into the politics of the country and send its agents into Congressional districts to aid in the defeat of the Representatives of the people who stand in the way of their personal aggrandizement. On the one hand we propose to promote American industry in all its departments by putting this five million and odd dollars now paid into the Treasury of the United States as an additional sum that may be paid by those who turn tinned plate from its imported condition into the various forms in which it can be used in America to those who, in one way or another, furnish the material which is to be canned, or the labor used in these various industries. On the other hand, our opponents propose to pay as a bonus $11,000,000 taken from American tax-payers without consideration or compensation under the pretense of aiding American labor. It is not strange that with the hope of accomplishing such a result, associations can be organized, funds for corrupt election purposes raised, and lobbies paid to influence Congress.

As another illustration of this difference, I may give the different propositions concerning the duty on wool and woolen goods. In the report of the majority is a table showing the relation of the proposed duties under this bill to those proposed by the meeting held in this city last January of the so-called "Wool Growers' Association," and the "Woolen Manufacturers' Association," at which it was agreed that the schedule set out in that table should be submitted to Congress, and if possible, adopted by this Congress as a proper schedule of taxation upon the woolen goods which the American people must use.

To that meeting the tax-payers and the consumers were not invited. Their presence would have been held to have been an impertinence; and from the standard of the gentlemen participating in that meeting this would have been just. They knew that the present tariff law had been, in the main, the result of the dictation of just such meetings held in this and other cities during the last twenty-seven years. The tariff legislation had been practically in the nature of private and special legislation for the purpose of giving to those who succeeded in having "hearings" before the committee that rate of duty which their greed—not their necessities—required. They had grown habituated to the custom of dictating legislation, and the very force of habit, if nothing else, would have prevented them from inviting so inconsequential guests as the tax-payers and the consumers. Some one at that meeting boasted that the Wool-Growers' Association carried a million of voters in its pocket. Such votes as that gentleman could carry in his pocket might find entire comfort in the space which would be allotted to him, in company with a million others, in such pocket.

Their ideal of a Ways and Means Committee was one composed of gentlemen who represented such associations, which belief seems to be shared by Representatives on this floor, whose indignation at the spectacle of a committee framed to represent the tax-payers and the consumers struggles with the proprieties of life to find utterance. Yet the same fierce charge was made in the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses.

This Kentucky Speaker seems to be possessed with the absurd idea that the people who pay taxes and purchase goods, who raise wheat and cotton, who live on farms and till the soil, really ought to have some voice in legislation concerning the weight of the burden of taxation which they are to bear, and some representation on the committee whose duty it is to report bills for raising revenue. The idea may be absurd, but, gentlemen, it is growing in popularity, and we are ready to join issue with you in your clamorous plea that the tariff must not be revised except by the friends of the industries protected by it, and to assert that it must be revised by the representatives of all the people who are taxed by it.

I do not hesitate to declare that the schedule agreed upon at that meeting is simply iniquitous. It will be borne in mind that we raise in America about 265,000,000 pounds of wool; that it requires more than 600,000,000 pounds for the uses to which wool is put in our country under our climate. By reason of climatic influences, over which Congress has no control, the hair necessary to be used in certain manufactures can be grown only outside of our territory; and also certain wools not produced in America are absolutely needed to be mixed with our wools to produce the fabrics required. Therefore to utilize the 265,000,000 pounds of American wool and to produce the amount of woolen goods absolutely necessary, there must be imported, either in its raw state or in its manufactured state, over 300,000,000 pounds of wool.

The wage cost of producing woolen goods is estimated to be about $17.70 per $100 worth. This is ample protection for the difference between the cost of labor in America and abroad upon any theory whatever, because it gives to the manufacturer the entire cost of the labor he uses. But every pound of wool imported in a manufactured state is so much labor taken from our wage-earners. Every yard of imported cloth represents labor done abroad and the subtraction of that much labor that could by possibility be done here. So that any system which results in the introduction of finished product rather than of crude material is a direct blow at the labor of this country. But this is not the only injury done to labor by this system. The laborers must wear the clothes made out of the wool; our climate necessitates it. The duty on the material increases the cost of his clothing, so that he is by the same act deprived of labor and also compelled to pay an increased cost for his clothing. In addition, as the duty on the raw material is inflexible and must be paid by the manufacturer, whenever there is a depression in prices the only place where the manufacturer can make diminished expenditure is by decreasing the wages of his laborers, so that this laborer who has been deprived in large part of what is his legitimate work and has had added to his expenses the increased cost of his living, becomes now also the victim of the periodic depressions caused by this tax.

The farmer obtains no better advantage under this tax than the laborer. Except in a very few instances, the husbandry of sheep is a subsidiary interest to the farmer's business. Our opponents talk of the "million of flock-masters," as if "the flocks" these "masters" own were their principal capital. They talk also, in adding up the startling sums of money invested in this business, of the value of the farms on which these flocks are kept. There never was a more transparent piece of humbuggery. There are less than fifty millions of sheep in America. Making due allowance for the large flocks in the Territories and some of the Western and Southwestern States, and the large flocks owned by a few Eastern flock-masters, the average flock of the ordinary "flock-master" can not be greater than twenty to twenty-five sheep, whose cost is almost nothing, for they are the scavengers of the farm. And as mutton, they would pay for the slight expense to which their owners are put in taking care of and breeding them.

I have no doubt that I speak the experience of the great majority of farmers when I aver that a small flock of sheep is of itself an advantage to a farm, and that for the amount invested, the profit on a small flock of sheep is the very largest return of the farmer's operations. The vast majority of those who own sheep do not raise enough wool to clothe their families. The difference between the cost of their clothing by virtue of our tariff, and what it would be if wool were free, would in the great majority of cases cover more than the entire value of their clip—certainly more than any possible difference between the value of wools as "protected" if all our adversaries claim for protection were true, and the price of wool as free; so that the wool-raiser is more interested in the revision of the tariff and the reduction of the duties upon woolen goods upon the basis of free wool than he is in the perpetuation of the present tax. But as there are only a million of flock-masters, the fifty-five million of people scattered all through America who are not pecuniarily interested in the ownership of these flocks are compelled to pay an increased cost for all the woolen goods which they are obliged to use.

But the duty on wool has, by the experience of the last twenty-seven years, been demonstrated not to be of advantage to the wool-grower, because it has not given to him a constant, profitable, and permanent market. Of all the manufacturers we have had in America the woolen manufacturer has had apparently the largest protection and the hardest struggle for existence. He has had to produce his goods at so large a cost of production that he has been constantly on the verge of being unable to dispose of these goods at a price which rendered their manufacture remunerative. He has had to compete with foreign manufacturers who had an absolutely untaxed material, in the use of which, by the very necessity of the case, selection of different sorts of wool was necessary.

No duty could be made so high as to pay the American farmer for raising the sheep whose wools are necessary to be mixed with our wools, and no law could relieve the manufacturer from the necessity of using those wools. It has been a hopeless fight against the elements. Some men have made large fortunes under it by making the cheaper fabrics which, under the prohibitory operation of specific duties, has given to them the absolute control of the American market, which cheaper fabrics are made, not out of wool, but out of wool and adulterants in all proportions from one-tenth wool up, as the conscience or the greed of the manufacturer dictated.

Now, after these twenty years of experience, this meeting held in Washington deliberately undertook to force upon the American people a schedule which increases the almost intolerable burdens now put upon woolen goods, in utter disregard to the claims of justice or the laws of supply and demand. The committee propose duties which are too high, duties which are unnecessary to give to the woolen manufacturer the control of the American market, and these duties range from 30 to 50 per cent.

We have placed these duties thus, because we felt it was to the interest of every section of the country that the woolen industry should be prosperous; that the wool-grower should have a prosperous purchaser of his wool; and the woolen wage-worker finds steady employment in factories running at full time the whole year. And we have placed the duties high enough, in our judgment, to absolutely secure this in spite of any undervaluation or fraud that dishonest importers may be guilty of. And yet our opponents propose to put on these same goods duties running from 69 to 134 per cent. We have arranged the schedule so that the cheaper article may be imported, if it be necessary so to do to prevent any combination or trust, and so as to give to the purchaser thereof an opportunity to buy goods made out of wool instead of so-called woolen goods made out of wool and adulterants. They have devised a scheme by which all the cheaper goods are absolutely prohibited from importation. The finest goods which the rich need have had placed upon them the lowest duties, while the goods which the humble, and even the prosperous who are not wealthy, must use, must be purchased from the American manufacturer. If the American people could be induced to take this table and thoroughly understand the present schedule, the schedule proposed by the committee, and the schedule proposed by the meeting held in January, I believe it would end the controversy between us.

The clamor against free wool which has frightened some is absolutely without justification. The proportion that the wool interest bears to the agricultural interests of America is so small, and the difference—even if all that our opponents say could be true—between its value now and its value under free wool is so inappreciable when compared to the aggregate of the vast wealth of America, and of all the investments which the farmer holds, that the clamor for its protection demonstrates what skillful organization, backed with the aggressiveness of private gain, and urged with conscienceless audacity can do. If this bill goes into operation, one of its beneficent results and not the least will be the emancipation of American politics from the domination of the so-called wool-growers and the freedom of the representatives of the people from the control of those who profess to speak in the name of the million of flock-masters.

The mortgages on the farms and city property of the West represent only a small part of the aggregate price the farmer has paid under a system he has been induced to support by the bribe of taxed wool.

No one, in the true sense of the word, owns the soil he tills, unless the profits of his toil belong to him; otherwise he is merely a tenant, no matter under what name he may work. Under our system the farmer is forced to see his profits, willy-nilly, go to those by whom and for whose benefit this tariff was enacted. By a law which no Congress can control the price of the surplus of any merchandise fixes the price of the entire supply. The price of wheat, cotton, and of other crops and produce, of which we export a surplus, is fixed under free trade at Liverpool. The profits of this produce are more than swallowed up by the cost of what has to be purchased, which is fixed at home under this tariff; so that the farmer's profit has annually gone under the operation of this tariff to those for whom in reality he has been toiling. If it were the profit only it might be endurable, but it has been far more than the profit. The enormous debt owed by the West and South to the East represents two distinct sums—investments out of which the debtor hopes for profitable return and the deficit between the income and the expenditures of the debtors. What this latter amount is it may be impossible to accurately estimate, but in the aggregate it is very large, and is due to the operation of our class legislation.

And as the causes which created the first deficit still exist, and in addition thereto must the annual interest be met, this deficit must continue to increase until disaster occur or those causes be removed. That which produced the necessity for borrowing even when agricultural products were high, will increase this burden of debt, and the depression of our agricultural interests will continue. Our country is so new and rich and there are so many sources of wealth that the slowly accumulating debt is carried without such bending under the load as to make the debtors cry out. But the private debt of the farmers of America is very large, and must of necessity increase unless relief comes by enabling them to sell their products where they can sell at the highest and buy their supplies where they can purchase at the lowest price.

Can he not afford to try the experiment and see if it be not possible to have a financial system which will enable him to keep his own surplus?

The failure of legislative attempts to make employments permanent is signally illustrated in the flax and hemp industry of America. Flax and hemp and the grasses out of which fabrics can be made can be grown in every part of America. The seed of the flax and hemp is valuable for oil, of which great quantities are needed. Since 1842 the duties on both flax and hemp have been more than sufficient to make the production thereof profitable if there were no other causes at work. The duty on hemp was originally imposed in 1789 for the benefit of Georgia, in which State not a pound, practically speaking, has been raised for many years. Under natural causes wholly independent of the tariff the production of hemp increased in America until it reached 79,000 tons.

The peculiar form of labor in Missouri and Kentucky, with the fertility of their soil, rendered it so profitable to raise hemp that they gradually drove from the market all other American hemp. While the tariff still remained the production of hemp in America decreased until it fell below 5,000 tons, while the products made out of hemp and kindred fibers enormously increased. During the last few years, with the duty at precisely the same amount, the farm value of hemp has fluctuated from over $10 a cwt. to less than $4 a cwt., and the amount of its production has varied from less than 5,000 to probably as much as 10,000 tons. The duty did not raise the price to $10 a cwt.; it did not lower the price to less than $4 a cwt.

Substantially, this has been the history of flax as well as hemp, until to-day the flax grown in America is grown for the seed, and no attempt made to use the fiber. In the mean time substitutes have been found for all the coarser products made from flax and hemp. Our cotton has been covered by bagging made from jute butts; standing cordage has been made from wire. As wheat and cotton had to compete in the Liverpool market with wheat and cotton raised in India, the cost of their production had to be reduced to the lowest possible sum; and so inventive genius has been at work to cheapen the expense of these necessary articles. In the process of these inventions the wheat is harvested with reapers which tie the bundles with twine. Over 33,000 tons of this twine was used in America last year out of, in the main, imported crude material. The use of the finished fabrics made from flax has continued in America even though, for climatic reasons, most of it must be made abroad. Now, during all these years, in the vain attempt to "protect" the flax industry, large taxes have been imposed on the raw material and on the manufactured product. It has been a hopeless contest, except in one aspect. Those who were interested in keeping up this system and who were making from it large sums of money could easily afford to pay to Kentucky nominally $25 a ton on from 5,000 to 10,000 tons of hemp to silence her protest against the continuance of taxation which required her to pay not only this bribe, which she appeared to receive, but in addition thereto enormous sums.

It was a bargain that the gentleman from Pennsylvania can well afford to plead with the Kentucky people to keep up, that they should apparently receive from $150,000 to $300,000 a year nominal protection for their hemp, which sum they actually paid themselves, and in addition thereto paid to others very much larger sums, while his constituents and those interested with them really obtained through the operation of this system those profits which built up their cities and States. And the references made on this floor by him and other gentlemen to Kentucky and the whisky trust are simply to weaken the influence of the Representatives from Kentucky, who will no longer consent to be parties to any such "combine." Last year nearly 160,000 tons of these fibers were imported, upon which was a tax of $1,930,340, and on the products manufactured therefrom an additional tax of $7,567,641.72.

I submit to the good people of that State that it is my duty to accept the proposition contained in the bill reported, by which the nominal protection to hemp, amounting to perhaps $200,000, is surrendered, and the American people relieved thereby from a tax of $4,766,846.88; that it would be utterly unbecoming in me to ask the American Congress to pay to the people residing in the blue-grass section of Kentucky less than a quarter of a million of dollars if thereby they had to tax themselves this $4,766,846.88. This is the debit and credit side of this much of this bill, but the result thereof is of far more importance really than the amount of taxation removed by this bill.

I trust that the passage of this bill will break up the "trust" made by the Binder Twine Association, by which the price on binding-twine is kept at several cents per pound more than a fair profit thereon.

Wheat and cotton are relieved of a burden which was constantly growing. All articles which have to be put in bags, all furniture which has to be wrapped in burlap, and the numerous other products into which these materials are woven, will be so much cheapened by this bill and the cost of their manufacture diminished that all the goods which can be made out of them in our climate ought to be made in America, and the the result of that will be that the uses to which American flax and American hemp can be put will increase the demand for such products. It will be no longer in the power of combinations and trusts to control prices, and the producer of the raw material in America will find that he will have a free market and a fair demand for his crop.

There can be no better demonstration of the wisdom of permitting raw material to be imported free of duty than the experiment tried with raw silk and raw hides. To-day our silk industry is in a most prosperous condition, gradually but surely driving foreign silk from our market, and it will, I confidently predict, successfully compete in other markets with such silks as our climate will permit to be made in this country. It is still more strikingly illustrated in all those industries which are based upon raw hides. The producer of the raw material in America has not been injured; but, on the contrary, benefited by the permission given to our manufacturers to import the material needed by them free of duty, and our tanners, glove-makers, manufacturers of all kinds of leather and of boots and shoes have continued to prosper.

The importation of hides has greatly increased, and the prosperity of those who use them has proportionately increased. There is no reason to doubt that precisely the same result would follow the permission to obtain wool on the same terms that raw silk and raw hides are obtained. The indirect influence has been equally as marked. Our only trade with certain countries grows out of our purchase of raw hides and coffee. Remove the barriers and this trade will widen until we will control the entire trade of those countries whose principal products are raw material, which we can turn into the finished product which they must have.

The questions which necessarily arise out of the discussion occasioned by the introduction of the bill reported by the Committee on Ways and Means have been inherited from our fathers and will be of equal interest to our sons. The very existence of government necessitates the sovereign power of taxation. It is impossible to conceive of a government, in any true sense of that term; of society organized into any form in which it is capable of protecting life, liberty, and property, without the power of requiring the payment of the sums needed for the daily administration of its affairs.

It is the sovereign power, for by it the Government assumes the right and exercises the power to take from the citizen such part of his earnings as is necessary for its support, prior to permitting him to use them for the support of those dependent upon his labor. By means of it, it substracts from the support of the families of its citizens its own expenditures. It ought therefore to absolutely need the money before it resorts to this power, and the limitation upon its exactions should be its necessities. And in a free government where there are, in the eyes of the law, no classes; where every one is the equal of every other one under our institutions and in the protection afforded by the law, not only ought the taxation to be strictly limited by the necessities of the Government, but it ought to be impartially and equally collected from the citizenry. As far as it is possible to accomplish this end, every man should be required, as every man ought to be willing, to pay his fair proportion of the expenses of the Government which has been formed for the purpose of his protection, to which he owes his allegiance, and by means of which he is secured in the enjoyment of the property that he has earned or inherited; and he ought not to be required to pay any more than that fair share.

We therefore, in the very nature of our institutions, find these two fundamental principles; the amount of taxation is to be limited by the necessities of the Government; the distribution of the burdens is to be impartial and equal. When I say the necessities of the Government I mean that the objects for which taxation is levied must be governmental and public purposes; that it is a fraud, under the guise of providing for public expenditures, to lay taxes for private objects. It may be difficult to draw the line of division between public and governmental purposes and private purposes, precisely as it is difficult to draw the exact line which the twilight obscures between day and night. But he who professes to have any doubt about the existence of this line of demarkation is as absolutely foolish or false as he who would deny that there is a broad and visible distinction between the light of noonday and the darkness of midnight.

So, too, it may be quite impossible to so lay and collect the taxes as that the exact proportion that in absolute justice should be assessed against each individual citizen can be ascertained, but it is not difficult to frame the law with the desire and to draw its provisions with the honest purpose to secure that approximate equality which is possible.

Therefore, in the very nature of our Government, the power of the United States to levy and collect taxes is limited by the necessities of the Government economically administered, and its power to apportion those taxes is limited to an impartial distribution among the citizens of the United States. Any system of taxation which violates these two principles is necessarily vicious. But even in a broader view it is vicious under any form of government. The very foundation of all social order is both private and public honesty. Under no form of government nor under any possible pretense can the mere power by which one man's money is given to another man, without his consent and without compensation, be justified. Whenever by operation of law the money earned by one man can be taken by another without just compensation, then the power by which it is done, no matter under what pretense it is exercised, is in the ultimate analysis immoral, and the result is legalized robbery. No argument can change this essential truth; no possible appeal to the growth of the country, to the accumulation of wealth, to the apparent prosperity of the years in which such a system may have been in vogue can justify such a system.

I know that the old and divine test that "by their fruits ye may know them" has been applied by those who profess to be great thinkers as demonstration of the virtue of systems which have in them some inherent vice; so, too, coincidence and proximity are taken for cause and effect—the post hoc for the propter hoc; and we are in the midst of argumentation of precisely the same sort to-day about the fiscal system of the past twenty-seven years. In my boyhood and early manhood I heard this argument applied when it seemed to be unanswerable. Through negro slavery, it was claimed, a great and fertile country had been redeemed from the forest, had been cultivated to the highest degree of fertility; noble cities had been built; magnificent rivers covered with a profitable commerce; a civilization as delightful as it was splendid had within the memory of living men been developed under a sky of surpassing beauty amid a people adorned with every noble characteristic; and at the beginning of the year 1860 the prosperous, rich, and powerful Southern States, with a future of illimitable hope and glory—the demonstraton that African slavery was indeed a beneficent and fruitful institution—seemed by this rule to set the matter beyond dispute. But who now, recalling those sad years of war, and sadder years of reconstruction, and the difficulties which now encompass our people as they are trying to solve the problem of the duplex races, would attempt by that rule to prove the proposition which our fathers so firmly believed?

It has been recognized by the world that the union of church and state has not by the same rule been demonstrated to be most wise. Its advocates point to the gradual illumination of the world, as it emerged from the Dark Ages, led by the church, whose bishops were soldiers and whose soldiers were priests, as the result of that union which gave to the church the power of the sword, and made the sword instinct with the spirit of the church, so that by the power of heroic might the nations were conquered, and by the sweet influence of priestly care they were converted. Yet who in America, recalling all the other facts connected with this long union of church and state, the scaffold and the fagot, the dungeon and the rack, would dare to advocate that we should return to the day when the ruler of the people knelt before the head of the church, and when the decrees of councils contemptuously set aside the enactments of parliaments. The free churches of America, the free churches everywhere, have found that the only true servitude is to God, the only lasting power from God; that, ruling by love through the faith which makes men free, they are indeed powerful. The lesson can not be too often taught, that a vicious principle is in the very nature of the case obliged to work in the end disaster. Whatever may be the appearance during the time when this principle is at work, of prosperity or power, or growth, or wealth, is either only appearance, or it is in spite of and not because of the principle. [Applause.]

No system of taxation could be so oppressive and so vicious as to have prevented the development and growth of the United States. A country like ours—in its resources so abundant, in its soil so fertile, in its minerals so exhaustless, in its water-power so powerful, lying midway between the two oceans, so as to face Europe on the one shore and the Orient on the other; inhabited by a people the very most enterprising, energetic, and aggressive that the world has ever seen; possessing in the highest degree the faculty of order and the capacity to build States—could not but prosper in spite of any system of taxation which the wit of man perverted to the aggrandizement of personal ends might devise.

When the mere erection of a cabin and the building of a fence and the plowing of the surface of the virgin soil change the value of land from a dollar and a quarter an acre to ten and fifteen dollars an acre; when the deficit of breadstuffs, which would have brought the world to the verge of starvation, could be supplied only by the surplus which these virgin farms, with scarcely any culture joyously rendered; when the clothing which the world needed had in large part to be weaved from the cotton which grew hoar on these fields; when the immigrants from narrow and tax-ridden homes abroad found new and ample homes and constant and profitable labor in these new and outstretching prairies, there was no possibility that any system of taxation could be so oppressive and mischievous as to prevent the marvelous growth and development of such a country. It could only retard that growth and create conditions which would bring unhappiness and distress. It could not prevent the accumulation of wealth; it could only distribute it unequally and oppressively. It could not make the country weak; it could only make the citizens divisible into unequal classes. It could do great harm, but it could not produce destruction.

All the good which these various and fruitful causes have produced has been claimed by the advocates of this system as the necessary and natural result of it. By it God gave to the sun the heat which produced the harvests; through its occult influences the rivers ran downward to the sea; by the resistless might of its silent energies the crops grew and were harvested, and the new homes of the West built, and the railroads laid down. Without it nothing can be accomplished. Its advocates, however, do not ascribe to it the evils which have grown up during the years of its domination. All prosperity comes from it. All adversity comes from other sources.

I am not one of those who in my zeal for revenue reform undertake to prove that the country has not grown richer during this past quarter of a century. Nor am I one of those who ascribe to the protective tariff all those troublesome problems which press upon us for solution. We have daily increased in wealth. There have been sufficient causes for this increase. We have had and now have evils which need remedy. There are other causes than the protective tariff which have helped to produce these evils. We deceive ourselves and we weaken our cause when we are not frank and just about these matters. But there are evils which a protective tariff either produces or, uniting with other causes, aids in producing.

Thirty years ago the American flag was seen in every port. In our bottoms outgoing cargoes paid freight to our ship-owners and incoming cargoes added to the profits of the trip. Our insurance companies during those years obtained the premiums on those cargoes. Our warehousemen received the commissions for their storage. Our merchants made the profits on the exchange of these goods. We sold in the foreign markets in which we were able to buy. We sold at a reasonable profit, we bought at a fair price. The material which we obtained in exchange for our manufactured product we turned into new product, and our laborers obtained the profit of the wages thereby occasioned. And so, year by year, as this commerce grew our wealth accumulated.

All this has been changed; partly it has been caused by the substitution of the iron vessel for the wooden vessel; but largely caused by a system of taxation which rendered it impossible for an American to carry on trade with a foreigner. You can not sell to advantage where you can not buy at a profit. While barter in the old mode, where one man traded his grain for another man's cloth, has apparently passed away, all the commerce of the world is equally barter now as it was then. No man can buy unless some man will buy from him that which he has to sell. No man can sell unless he can buy from the person to whom he sells, directly or indirectly. Besides that, there is a profit which is enormous from the mere handling, if I may so express it, of trade. As civilization increases, in the mere bringing to the consumer that which the producer has made and returning to the purchaser that which the consumer has paid there is a large profit. He who transports these goods, he who insures them, he who guaranties the credit involved in the transaction, he who manages the business of the exchange, becomes as necessary as the weaver or the manufacturer, and must have his share of the cost of production and profit of the transaction.

The little country of Holland has never raised enough in any one year to preserve it from starvation during that year. It has never manufactured enough cloth to prevent its people from great suffering. Rescued from the sea by dykes, it has seized from the sea its enormous accumulation by the mere profit of the exchange of commodities between the producer and the consumer. With the possible exception of two States of the American Union, and a tribe or two of American Indians, the people of Holland per capita are the wealthiest in the world—literally the accumulations given by the ocean to the people who have gathered the profits from exchanging the commodities of the world.

We ought to own the ocean; with our mineral resources and our forests and our extraordinarily long seacoast, with our interior lakes and our mighty rivers, we ought to have been the ship-building, ship-owning, and ship-carrying nation of the world. Into our hands ought the commerce of the world to have naturally drifted; into our coffers ought to have been gathered the profits of these exchanges. It was ours thirty-five years ago; not all of it, but more than 70 per cent. of it, and the great bulk of it ours potentially. We have lost it. We own no ships except those that are in the coastwise trade, with such exceptions that they scarcely need to be spoken of. Our own exports are transported in foreign bottoms under foreign flags, and all the profits of their carrying in every way, and of the returning cargo of imports for which they are sold, go to foreigners. Millions upon millions which ought to have belonged to us have been literally given by us, thrown into the laps of foreigners by our own action.

In 1855, of the tonnage of our foreign trade 71.95 was American; in 1887, 14.80 per cent. was ours; an aggreg ate decrease of 57.15—the average annual decrease from 1855 to 1866 and from 1866 being about 1½ per cent.

The annual freight paid on our foreign trade to foreigners has been variously estimated from $140,000,000 to $200,000,000. This enormous annual tax, now paid to foreigners, ought to have been ours; and the aggregate sum which we have thrown away in our selfish folly since 1855 is much larger than our public debt.

The advocates of the present tariff system vehemently deny that this gradual and fatal decay has been caused by it. They can not deny that as a remedy this policy has been wholly inefficacious. Since 1866 this decay has gone on under the protective system. We can hope for no relief from it.

The unrestrained power in Congress to enact navigation laws was the result of a "bargain" of the New England States with some of the Southern States by which an equivalent therefor, the continuance of the African slave trade for twenty years, was guarantied (Hildreth's United States, volume 3, page 520), and the navigation laws under which we have lost the carrying trade of our own foreign commerce were conceived in that spirit and enacted in pursuance of that bargain.

The basal thought on which rest legislation creating slavery, prohibitory tariffs, and compulsory navigation regulations, is precisely the same; the power of society organized into government to take from one man that which is his and bestow it by operation of law upon another. Slavery took all of a man's labor, returning only a livelihood measured by the humanity and will of the master. High tariff filches so much of his labor as is necessary to pay the difference caused by the tariff in cost of necessary articles. Compulsory navigation laws force him to purchase, not where he chooses, but where he must. All restrict liberty of action and of selection by legislation, and restrain freedom of choice for the private benefit of others. This thought is at war with the development of man and the progress of civilization, and all legislation based on it must fail.

The substitution of steam for wind as the motive power, and of iron for wood as the material, at once made our navigation laws "antiquated," and to preserve our superiority on the seas we ought to have so amended our laws as to permit American ship-building to be done on equal terms with foreign ship-building, and to permit our citizens to purchase wherever they could buy on the best terms. As sea-freightage is fixed by the laws of free trade—for the oceans scorn our tariff laws and despise our navigation regulations—our obstinate adherence to the selfish policy which controlled our legislation could have no other result. We doomed our ship-owners to a ruinous competition with foreign ship-owners by our navigation laws; and to make the fight absolutely hopeless we prohibited them from receiving returning cargoes by our tariff laws.

We have lost not only what I have just pointed out, but in addition to that, we have actually lost that trade which ought to be ours, even if it were carried on for us by foreigners. Not even can the foreigners, who get all the profit of what commerce we have, keep the American commerce from dwindling year by year. American goods can not be sold anywhere in the world, except as to certain articles of which I will hereafter speak, because America will not allow the purchaser of those goods to sell to American consumers that which that purchaser raises, nor will it allow its own citizens to purchase from those consumers that for which and for which alone they could be induced to buy from us.

An American manufacturer is not able to compete in South America with English manufacturers, because when he offers his goods to that consumer in South America the consumer has nothing with which he can pay—leaving out hides and coffee—that the American can afford to purchase to bring into the country; for the first act that the American Government does to this American citizen who tries to extend American commerce is, without judge or jury, to mulct him in a fine of an average of $46 for every $100 of goods which he has had the criminality to attempt to purchase to bring into America, to have worked up by American laborers in American factories, for the purpose of selling at a profit to go into the pockets of American citizens.

This is not a fancy sketch or flower of rhetoric. We have Canada on the north of us, Mexico, Central America, and South America on the south of us; China, Japan, and "The Isles of the Sea" opposite to us on the west, and their trade ought to be with us—by divine right it is ours. The millions which a fair profit thereon gives to other nations could belong to us. These golden currents which would beautify and fructify our fair land have been turned from our shores by the miserable short-sightedness of those whose greed has weakened their vision and whose selfishness has obscured their judgment.

The climate and other influences which, under Divine Providence, determine what shall be the natural products of a country force us to buy certain material which we need, and which we can not raise. To the extent of that necessity, and to it alone, seek we any commercial relations with the world anywhere. We must have certain articles. At great loss and burden, with enormous duties, we purchase those articles and pay for them so far as possible with our manufactures. To this extent and this extent alone have we trade relations with the world, except so far as our cotton, our breadstuffs, and our provisions are concerned. There the reverse is true—the nations must have these products—they would not buy them from us if they could obtain them anywhere else in the world. Our surplus wheat supplies the deficit of the world's harvest. Our cotton supplies the clothing of the world, and if it were not a necessity we could sell neither wheat nor cotton, so that all the trade we have with the world is compulsory.

But for the blessings of an abundant Providence we would have isolated ourselves from all mankind. If we could have raised all we wanted, and if the world could have raised without us all it wanted, we would have succeeded in erecting barriers more impassable than the fabled Chinese wall. Wherever there has been a possibility to estrange a nation from us, so far as commercial relations were involved, we have succeeded in doing it. It is the only civilized country in the world whose policy has been sedulously to make money by eating each other up—whose highest political economy has been that a people can grow fat upon each other; that by taxation wealth can be accumulated; that the more the Government takes from its citizens the richer the citizens are by the subtraction. And of course such a system must necessarily produce evil symptoms; not at once, and not disastrously in the time at which it has been at work, because other causes have operated and other forces have been at work to minimize the evils of this system.

The necessity for our breadstuffs, our provisions, and our cotton has made a trade out of which we have gotten great profit in many ways and have preserved commercial relations from which great good has resulted. On the other hand, the absolute free trade which under the most beneficent provision of the American Constitution has been made obligatory within the territory of the United States, has given to this great country and to its many millions of people a trade and commerce the blessings of which can not be estimated. The really marvelous growth of the country, so far as any financial system has effected it, has been the result of this magnificent experiment of absolute internal free trade, which has given day by day a daily lie to all the theories upon which our foreign system has been advocated. While it has been claimed that Boston can not succeed with her wealth and enterprise and capital against Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, she has succeeded against the pauper African labor of the South; and Chicago, which could not by any possibility have succeeded as the rival of Toronto, has been able to grow into a magnificent city of a million people in rivalry to New York.

When the boundary of the American territory was the eastern bank of the Mississippi River, all our good people had to be protected against the pauper labor that roamed at large in the uncivilized territory west of the river. But as soon as Thomas Jefferson acquired the territory of Louisiana it was found that free trade was a blessing to the foot of the Rocky Mountains, but that it was disastrous for it to go one step further so that the pauper labor of the Mexicans living beyond that boundary could compete with the American laborer; but when the war of 1847 carried our boundary to the Pacific Ocean and gave us the magnificent territory of Texas, it was found that free trade from ocean to ocean and from lake to gulf made every section prosper. And when in the certain progress of American development Canada becomes one with us, absolute free trade between us will again vindicate itself, as it has between the States.

In levying taxes they ought to be so levied until we may be ready for direct taxation, as, first, to be just, as nearly as this can be accomplished; and second, if it were possible, to be imposed upon and payable out of the surplus of the country, and not out of the amount necessary for the support thereof; and third, to be voluntary, so that the tax-payer, who is also citizen, should not be in a constant state of irritation towards the Government to which he owes allegiance and of which he is in part sovereign.

The system we have violates all of these principles. The very essence of protection is that one man shall pay under the pretense of revenue to his government a bonus to another man; that the purchaser shall be compelled to purchase from an American manufacturer at a price higher than he would be able to obtain the articles for if he were absolutely free to buy wherever he chose; that he should therefore pay for that article two distinct sums of money—one, its fair value to him; the other, the added price which by operation of law he is compelled to pay to the manufacturer, and for which he directly gets nothing. Whatever excuse may be given for this, however it may be claimed that the country is indirectly benefited thereby, and that the purchaser of these protected goods contributes in this way as really to the public prosperity as if he paid these sums into the public Treasury; the fact remains that in all these industries in which protection is of any advantage one citizen receives by operation of law the earnings of another citizen for which he gives nothing.

I say advisedly, where protection is of any advantage, for there are duties imposed under our present system which are absolutely of no advantage to any human being, neither to the manufacturer, the purchaser, nor the consumers. There are others about which we may dispute as to whether they are of advantage or not. There are others which were purely shams put into the statute for the purpose of deception. The duty on wheat and cotton, whose price is fixed in Liverpool under free trade, is purely a sham; it does not in any way affect the price of either of these articles. The duty on certain cotton fabrics, of which we export large quantities to the East, has ceased to be of any advantage either to the Government, which derives no revenues thereby, or to the manufacturer, who finds that he can make and sell them at prices which successfully compete in foreign markets with foreign manufacturers. And in some cases where the duty is just so much added to the price of the article changes wholly beyond the power of American legislation alter this condition. The duty on copper did not bring to the American Treasury scarcely a cent; it simply put into the pocket of the owners of our copper mines the whole duty imposed, and was a burden, to the precise extent of the duty, upon all American manufacturers of copper and copper wares, and was added, together with the interest and profits thereon, to the cost of such articles as American purchasers had to buy in which copper was a component material. Enormous profits therefore went into the pocket of the copper-mine owners. Some of these profits have been beneficently spent by those to whom by the operation of this iniquitous law these large sums were paid. Charities which bear the name of these copper-mine owners were in reality paid in small sums by all the American citizens scattered over every section of the country who are compelled to use copper in the various forms in which it enters into domestic use. And the foreign manufacturers of copper obtained from the American mines their crude article at the same price that the American manufacturer did, minus the duty, and to that extent had the advantage of their American competitors.

But as the production of copper in the world was not equal to its use, a foreign syndicate has been formed which has purchased the entire output of the known copper mines for a period said to be three years in the future, and has by this means put up the price of copper all over the world nearer to the level of its former price to the American user thereof. So that at present, while the copper-mine owner obtains his profit from the foreign syndicate, and the American consumer of copper is not benefited by this syndicate, the American manufacturer is put more nearly upon a level with his foreign competitor.

The duty upon steel rails has been largely a bonus. It is fair to say that steel rails can be profitably made in America for $26 a ton. They have been able by the operation of our tariff, giving $17 a ton protection, to do what it may be impolite, but perhaps not inaccurate, to call levy tribute on the railroad builders of from one thousand to twelve hundred dollars a mile for the 13,000 miles of railroad that were constructed in America in the year 1887. So that the profit over and above a fair living profit on their produce for that year, created altogether by law, could not have been less than $13,000,000.

The Pittsburgh Post in an editorial of May 1, speaking of the late labor difficulties at the Braddock Works, says:

> The cost of labor in the production of a ton of steel rails is estimated not to exceed $5 a ton. It is probably less than $4.

At other places the labor cost of a ton of steel rails varies from $3.85 (at Bethlehem, Pa.) to $7.57. So with the proposed duty of $11 per ton the entire wage is paid and a possible bonus of from $3.43 to $7.15 given to the manufacturer.

It is, however, fictitious to assert that this sum, enormous as it is, was paid out of the pockets of those who builded the railroads; it was raised mainly, if not altogether, by the sale of railroad bonds, the coupons upon which are part of the fixed charges which the railroad companies must earn or go into bankruptcy. This annual interest must be raised by the reduction of the wages of those employed by those companies, or by the increase of freight charged on what they transport. It is no doubt partly done by both. When the railroads pool this interest is raised by increased freight. When the railroads fall out and fierce competition ensues, it is raised by reduction of wages; so that in the end these enormous yearly bonuses paid to the steel-rail makers are burdens upon labor; they are paid by the reduced wages of the railroad employés, and the reduced cost that the farmer and producer must receive for his wares by means of the increased cost of transportation thereupon. Every bushel of Western wheat, every pound of Southern cotton, every barrel of pork transported over these roads, their price also fixed in the Liverpool market, must pay its share of this enormous sum mulct from honest labor by a provision of the tariff law passed in the name of American labor at the dictation of the most powerful organization in America.

I select these instances to illustrate that the present system violates intentionally the first principle I have laid down, that all taxation should be impartial, and also that it violates intentionally the second principle, that this taxation should, as far as possible, be paid from the surplus of the nation instead of from its daily livelihood. As it is now all the direct and indirect sums which must be paid because of the present tariff law are to be first subtracted from the aggregate income of the American nation, and are that much taken from this income before any of it can be used for the support of the American people. It is estimated that on the basis of the labor of 1880 the income of the American people was ten thousand millions of dollars. Before this can be distributed among the partners in this enormous corporation that we call the United States of America these sums must be subtracted, and as the sum is to be distributed among sixty millions of people, the amount subtracted, while in itself it may seem not to be very large in proportion to the enormous aggregate, is large in proportion to the amount received by each laborer in the country. The amount he pays must be measured not by the entire amount of this income, but by the sum which he is to receive therefrom.

A system of taxation which, if it could be devised, would give to each person in America a fair and comfortable living, and impose the burdens of the Government upon the surplus, which, being produced by the united labor of everybody, ought to bear, if it could be done, the expenses necessary to the protection of everybody, would be a wise and beneficent system. Under it there might be less rapid accumulations of great fortunes, but there could be no distress. It would fall so equally that no single person under its operation would be distressed. Now, the operation of the present law during the last twenty-five years has been precisely in the opposite direction, as is demonstrated by the accumulation of the almost fabulous fortunes which we have seen grow up under our eyes during those years.

Unequal distribution of the wondrous wealth which has been produced by American toil and accumulated by American economy has given to certain individuals fortunes greater than the world has ever seen under any other sky or any other system. The law of primogeniture, operating through the centuries, together with the vast growth of wealth in Great Britain, has not been able to give to any human being such a fortune as the protective tariff of America has enabled a few gentlemen to secure within a score of years. Colossal fortunes, made as if in a day, bear testimony to the viciousness of a system which enables so few men to absorb the surplus accumulations of a nation, and that, too, without adding anything to the growth of the country or to its happiness. It has laid the foundation of caste in creating classes and distinctions between the classes created by it.

Inevitably unjust legislation, giving unearned privileges to classes as classes, must produce class combinations and organizations to maintain the legislation once obtained; and this with equal certainty begets hostile combinations, and the result is the formation of caste, which simply means the permanent defeat of the weaker classes. I am not censuring those who have been the beneficiaries of this system, nor am I uniting in the clamor, which sometimes savors of demagogy, against them personally. I am simply pointing out the outward symptom which demonstrates that there must be an inward disease. I am simply asserting that the possibility of such a result must be caused by the viciousness of this financial system which for twenty-seven years has existed in America.

Generically the same causes produce strikes, riots for bread, labor organizations, and the other manifestations of resistance to oppressive class distinctions in Europe and America. It is the operation of unequal laws creating class benefits. In whatever form this oppressive distinction appears there will also be found resistance to it. As man moves forward in the upward path to a civilization imbued with the controlling spirit of the truth that all men are born free and equal, the depth of his original degradation and the weight of the yoke he wore measure the nature and extent of the revolt. In France the horrors of the revolution measured the long years of oppressive crimes of which that revolution was the retribution. In England the parliamentary struggles mark the point from which those people began the march to equality. If we will persist in class legislation we must submit to accept its necessary concomitant, discontent, exhibited first in protest by murmurings, then in resistance only by organizations, and then by whatever force the circumstances produce. We have as our hope of safety the ballot-box, by which peaceful revolution may prevent forceful revolt. But if enormous capital, through organized effort, can control the ballot-box and return its servants to Congress, discontent, founded on justice, will find a remedy. Free trade in England can not prevent, it will hasten, the ultimate abolition of the law of primogeniture, the disestablishment of an established church, the exclusive ownership of the soil, and of a hereditary legislative chamber. Protective tariffs and monopolistic legislation can not introduce into America permanent and hereditary class distinctions. He is a shallow thinker who does not know that man is essentially the same everywhere, and that his ultimate goal is a civilization based on equality.

And also our system enforces the collection of the taxes so as to give the tax-payer no option as to its payment. He does not pay to the tax-gatherer, as in the States where direct taxation is enforced. Nor does he pay voluntarily in the same sense as a man does who purchases a luxury, knowing that its ncreased price is caused by a revenue duty imposed thereon, but he is compelled to pay by the increased cost levied upon the necessities of life. Even if a hundred and twelve per cent. duty be levied upon his blanket, the blizzards which sweep over Kansas require a Kansas father to pay this involuntary tax with a demand more compulsory than the pistol of the highwayman with "Stand and deliver." He who has to build a house for his family on the homestead which he has acquired for nothing from the Government is compelled by a law, which knows no exception, to pay this involuntary tax upon every pane of glass which he puts into the window to let the sunshine in and keep the rain out; upon every foot of lumber and every nail which, together, make his home—not one dollar of which, as a rule, goes to his Government, nor lessens the burdens of his State taxes, but goes to citizens entitled under the law to no greater consideration and no higher favor than he.

It is undoubtedly true that under the operation of the stimulus of high protective duties, competition takes place. Men with small capital, unfamiliar with the particular industries thus protected, rush into them, factories are erected at large expense, and frequently on credit, at improper places, because the calculation on paper of the cost of the production and of the possible price under the protective duty, leaves an apparent profit so large as to overcome the great expense of interest, unfortunate selection of locality, and unfamiliarity with the business. Temporarily this competition produces decrease of the price asked of the consumer, and causes an overproduction of the article. Then comes, inevitably, disaster. The weak go to the wall. Bankruptcy diminishes the number of manufacturers, clamor is made for increased protection for the purpose of paying higher wages, while the wage of the laborer is necessarily diminished.

Then comes combination. The strong who have survived the storm of disaster see that they can take advantage of these duties much more profitably by a union among themselves, and fleecing their customers, rather than fighting each other, and trusts, pools, and organizations are formed by means of which prices are advanced and production diminished. I do not mean to say that a tariff either necessarily produces trusts or that it alone produces them. These organizations can be formed whenever combination of producers can prevent competition, but these trusts can be destroyed whenever they are formed under the operation of protective duties by lowering the duty so as to afford opportunity for foreign competition, whereby the consumer of the necessary article may have a chance to purchase it from some one else than the trust. I need not illustrate this by an attempt to go over the category of trusts, like the sugar trust, the linseed-oil trust, the borax trust, and the various other combinations which are the legitimate outgrowth of the system which Congress is asked to perpetuate, and which has the power by the irresponsible action of those interested in the product of these various articles to levy taxation upon the American people to the extent that our duty enables them to keep out the foreign manufacture.

The bill reported by the committee does not render certain the destruction of these combinations, but as to some of them it renders their exactions tolerable, and as to others we believe it will result in their dissolution. We urge that in the present condition of our financial affairs the country can well afford to make this experiment and say whether it is possible for Congress to prevent the exactions of these organizations. Those interested in these trusts, made possible by the present tariff, and which the proposed bill will dissolve, or will reduce their present exactions to more reasonable profits, naturally denounce those who prepared this measure, and use the gains gotten from the law to preserve unchanged the law. And those Representatives who represent these organizations may be expected to resist the passage of this bill desperately. I hold in my hand The Manufacturer, the official organ of the Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia, in which is published a memorial, and the opening sentence of the editorial thereon is:

> The club as a body of business men spoke in no unmeaning phrases at its last meeting. For the guidance of those who represent it in Congress, it put in the form of a memorial its sentiments concerning the reduction of revenue, etc.

Who represents "it" in Congress? "It" knows, I do not. But who ever represents the "Its," who have combined to enact this burdensome tariff and to defeat any amendments thereto which will give relief from the enormous exactions imposed by it and by means of it, will be found compacted against any tariff legislation which renders possible the dissolution of the "trusts." Fortunately no laws, however prohibitory, and no trusts, however greedy, can prevent the progress of invention and the achievements of skill, by which the cost of production is always being diminished. Our opponents point to the diminished cost of all articles during the period of the present tariff, and claim that it is because of the tariff.

The facts are as they state; the cause is not. There is not one product named by them, which is not to-day cheaper in England than in America. If the tariff thus operated, its present friends would soon become its bitterest foes. They do not fight so desperately for the continuance of laws whose operation is to destroy their profits. But no law can prevent that development which increases the efficiency of human labor as it increases in skill and multiplies many fold its power of production, nor can any nation so isolate itself as to be beyond the influence of this universal spirit of improvement. This at last is our safety.

Therefore skilled labor never needs protection. The more unskilled the labor is the less is it in demand and the lower its productive power and the higher its relative cost. So in times of depression the labor to which least money is paid is the first discharged, because the highest priced labor is the cheapest labor, producing more results in proportion to wage and therefore costing less to employer. The leader of the bar needs no tariff to protect him from the shyster, the great doctor does not fear the competition of the quack, nor does the respectable mechanic feel alarm at the competition of the pauper journeyman.

So it is certain, in spite of doctored figures, manipulated to conceal and mislead, that in America the labor receiving the highest wage produces for its employer the largest return, and is therefore the cheapest, and that as a rule the wage-cost of the fabrics in America is less than anywhere in the world. Free American labor from the trammels of our present tariff and it will conquer the world of trade. [Applause.] But even with prohibitory tariffs and numerous trusts the cost of production will continue to decrease and thereby cause some decrease in the cost to the consumer; but not in proper proportion, for under such a system the bulk of the sum thus saved in production will swell the profits of the manufacturer.

The question has been often asked by our opponents, why do immigrants come to America if labor is paid so nearly as much abroad as here. Our first answer is that the questioner always confounds the daily wage received by the wage-earner with the cost of his labor to his employer. The daily wage may be much greater than is paid elsewhere and yet the relative cost be, and probably necessarily is, less; for labor cost is to be measured by volume and value of production to him who pays; by amount of money and the purchasing power of that money to him who receives. But, secondly, in the meaning of the questioner, the assumed fact is not true. The "operatives" do not migrate to America; those who are in Great Britain and Europe, the wage-earners in those industries which are "protected" here, do not come to us. Mr. Powers, one of the brightest of the "press gang," to whom we owe so much, has done good service in an article exhibiting the occupations of our immigration, from which I have gathered this:

In the ten years from 1877 to 1886 there arrived in this country 4,255,295 immigrants, of whom somewhat more than one-half were women and children; of the remaining 2,120,582 there were only 35,581, or less than 2 per cent. operatives in the textiles, metals, and other protected industries, excluding miners, of whom there were 38,570, being less than 2 per cent. These were, as a rule, those with whom life had not gone well at home, and were of numbers just sufficient to be used either as a menace or a substitute to striking operatives. In the unprotected industries we received 2,046,431, of whom 1,523,707 were house servants, tillers of the soil, and common day laborers. These are attracted evidently by other causes than our tariff laws.

But, thirdly, the advantages offered by the new continent and our free institutions tempt men of all climes to cast their lot in with us. The tax-gatherer, the recruiting sergeant drafting into armies where 2,200,000 men are under rigorous discipline, and the hopeless contest against class distinctions drive thousands to our shores. Let us keep them and our own children happy by low taxes, no standing armies, and absolute equality of chances in the struggle of life.

Several times since this debate commenced the true argument against this bill, the only really effective appeal, has been uttered; it may be condensed into "United we stand, divided we fall." It is the argument of combination, of threat. Each "protected" syndicate says to all others in this greatest of all American "trusts," the "tariff combine," "We must stand together, four-squared like infantry in battle resisting a charge, for revision anywhere is defeat everywhere." So the sole duty any one will give up is that on sugar, because they believe the surrender of the sugar duty will take from the Treasury so many millions of dollars that thereby all the other duties may be saved. The promise to give bounties is as purely illusory as were the offers made on the Mount of Temptation. The present tariff is the result of combination; it is to be maintained by combination. The interests which secured its passage are to retain its benefits; the means received by it, so far as necessary, are to be used to perpetuate it. Yes, gentlemen, we recognize the force of this argument.

The removal of the duty on sugar will give no relief to the manufacturers of New England; it will not aid in the restoration of our lost commerce, remove the necessity for the use of Pinkerton's detectives to put down those strikes which have been lately discovered to be the evidences of contented labor and the demonstration of wise and happy industrial progress; secure a profitable market for Western wheat or Southern cotton; furnish competition to keep trusts within bounds; nor end—believe, good gentlemen, who defend this prohibitory tariff and class legislation—the agitation of which you complain. Free tobacco and free sugar will not bring submission to your exactions. Let us understand each other. We want a fair, conservative, moderate measure; we extend to you a compromise and offer a fair experiment. You may reject it, but you can not evade the issue. He who rejects compromises may live to regret it.

The present law can not remain as it is; its inequalities are too numerous and too unjust, its temptations to fraud too great, its burdens too onerous; revision is needed, and that, too, by every section of the country. The arrogance displayed on this floor by certain Representatives does not reflect the anxiety felt by many of their constituents. In New England and Pennsylvania, as in Minnesota and Michigan, are heard the murmurings of discontent. There is no section whose interests demand the passage of this bill more than New England. And to-day I appeal from such of her Representatives here as stand in the way of progress to her people at home to take hold of this matter. It was against her protest that the protective tariff was enacted—perhaps the most splendid protest against it was by her Webster. Her true interest is the reconquest of the seas. Her hope of regaining leadership in the Republic is to put herself in the van of this movement for free commerce and unshackled industrial activity. It doth not become her to oppose where men fight for ampler freedom.

The boast has been made on this floor that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means in the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses—that gallant and pure gentleman, brave of heart, clean of life, loyal to friend, frank to foe, with a conscience void of offense and a love for truth that nothing could daunt—has been stricken down because he opposed this "combine." Greatly as I deplore his defeat and as much as I miss his presence, it may be that his defeat, compassed as it was, will be of greater benefit than his presence. His very absence arrests the attention of the Republic, and all the people ask, "Are such elections necessary to the maintenance of this system?" Gentlemen protectionists, I warn you that the vacant seat of Morrison cries louder than the virtues of Duncan "against the deep damnation of his taking off." [Great applause on the Democratic side].

The effort in this debate by grave Representatives to demonstrate that taxation on foreign commodities is paid by the producers and not by the consumers; that prices are lowered by increasing the cost of production, and that taxation gives added wealth to the fruits of labor puts to shame the rhetorical and pious demonstration of Rev. Jasper, of Richmond, Va., that "the sun do rise and set," for not even before Galileo did any one ever believe thus, nor has it as much excuse as had the riots against the introduction of machinery which Miss Martineau so graphically describes.

One of the greatest of modern scientists has very recently said:

> No fact in political economy is more clear than that taxation on foreign commodities must ultimately be paid by the consumers, not by the producers. All taxation is a deduction from the fruits of labor and from the fertility of the soil of the country imposing it. No political economist has ever been able to show how prices to consumers can be lowered by increasing the cost of production.

This thinker and scientist had not the pleasure and advantage we have enjoyed of hearing this debate, for nothing can be more certain than our friends on the other side are political economists with whom "wisdom shall die," and that they have proven to their own entire satisfaction that those who believe what this thinker announces are miserably shallow and altogether wicked.

These agile and fertile debaters have as little regard for the facts of history as they have for the truths of political economy. To them the established fact that the era from 1850 to 1860 was one of wondrous prosperity and growth, and that 1860 was peculiarly and singularly a prosperous year, does not prevent them from solemnly declaring that under the Walker tariff the country nearly went to the damnition bowwows and was in 1860 on the very verge of bankruptcy. And no one has put this with greater power than did General Garfield in his speech of March, 1878.

The two countries which in the last quarter of a century have increased with the most marvelous growth have been our own and Australia. Different financial systems have dominated these two new and prosperous countries. One common cause for their prosperity attracts attention; that is, new land to be had almost for the asking. This is the prime cause of the past and present growth of both of these lands—not the only cause; for these countries are dominated by an English-speaking race, and on their fertile soil flourish free institutions. The continued prosperity of each is assured. Loving my own country more than all others in the world, I desire her to adopt a system that will enable her to outstrip this lusty young rival of the Pacific seas. It is within our power.

Seventy per cent. of the cotton which England turns into finished product and sells all over the habitable globe grows upon American soil. She comes to our markets, buys our raw material, transports it in her vessels to her docks, manufactures it with her laborers in her factories, transports it in her vessels to every port, transmutes it by barter under the laws of supply and demand into other articles; makes a profit on the purchase, on the freightage, on the manufacturing, and then on the articles for which she sells it. Her annual increase of receipts over the price that she pays us for our cotton is not less than $125,000,000. In twenty years her apparently overcrowded population has increased over six millions. The wages of her laborers have steadily increased. The number of her paupers and convicts has proportionately decreased. With equal strides have her political privileges been widened to larger classes of her citizens.

Now, this profit from the manufacture of this cotton should be ours. Our citizens ought to take this raw material raised in our fields, turn it into the finished product in factories owned by American capital, where American operatives receive the wage that would be a just proportion of the profit of this labor. Our ships ought to transport the outgoing and the incoming cargoes; our insurance companies receive the premiums; our commission merchants the commissions; our bankers the exchange. A system which prevents this is a system to be set aside. A system which gives hope of this is a system to be fairly tried. And as with cotton, so with wool, and all the material which by the ingenuity of man can be used for the comfort of man in his advanced civilization. Such a country as ours with such a system has a future which no imagination is able to accurately picture. If one standing on the banks of the Mississippi River eighty-five years ago, when Thomas Jefferson acquired that great western territory for America and free institutions, could have foreseen what has occurred during these years, not longer than the lifetime of some venerable citizens who linger yet among us, and had given utterance to the heavenly vision which passed before his eyes, he would have been held to be a mere dreamer.

If one, standing here in this Hall to-day and looking into the future, could be able to see what the years would bring us under a system where the untrammeled activities of a free Christian people find fruition, under a climate so salubrious and with a soil so fertile, all burdens to progress thrown aside, all the passions of the past removed, and every one engaged in a generous and unselfish rivalry to make for and out of the opportunities to which he is called all that is possible, no hand could paint and no orator picture what would be the result.

Then we, the children of exiles and emigrants, could welcome our kinsmen of all lands to cast their lot with us, for willing hands would find waiting work to yield a livelihood. The silence of rivers now broken only by the occasional boat would be turned into the sweet hum of profitable commerce. The secret lodges of anxious and discontented operatives would become the open assemblies of happy and contented families from whose hearth-stone the shadow of want had given place to the mild radiance of permanent comfort. The husbandman, no longer sowing in tears, would yet reap in joy—that joy which springs from content, and is founded in the certainty of an assured market at remunerative prices.

The legislation of the country, having for its object the public good and freed from the domination of private greed, would successfully grapple with the problems which progress will present, and a free people be represented by free representatives neither owned, seduced, nor terrified by organized interests.

Slowly will this future come. We have had our backs to it; to-day let us turn our faces to its rising sun. If we can do no more, we can lift our eyes toward this east of new hopes and resolve that from this hour our steps shall be in that direction. [Loud and long-continued applause.]

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the tariff bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House now take a recess until 8 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 8 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House (at 8 o'clock p. m.) was called to order by Mr. MCMILLIN, who directed the reading of the order providing for the Friday evening sessions.

The Clerk read the order.

JOHN RUTLEDGE.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2651) to remove the political disabilities of John Rutledge, of South Carolina, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That John Rutledge, of the State of South Carolina, be, and he is hereby, relieved of all political disabilities imposed upon him by the third section of the fourteenth article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, and being read the third time, was passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

HETTY K. PAINTER.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to call the attention of the House to the bill (H. R. 3839) granting a pension to Mrs. Hetty K. Painter, and to make this statement. This bill passed the House and went to the Senate, and was there amended. It came back to the House, was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and by them reported to the House with the recommendation that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in. I desire to move now that the amendments be non-concurred in, and that the request for a conference be granted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will appoint the conference committee hereafter.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole under the special order which has been read.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent that the Calendar of private bills be taken up, and that we commence where we left off on last Friday evening; each case to be called in its order on the Calendar, and when called unless responded to it be informally passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. RYAN. Before that is done may I ask where we left off; on what page of the Calendar?

The CHAIRMAN. The clerk at the desk is unable to state where the call was suspended at the last meeting. The RECORD, the Chair supposes, will show it.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. LONG. I object to that.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. Then I demand the regular order.

Mr. FORD. I ask unanimous consent that the regular order may be observed with this exception, that if no member present calls for the consideration of a bill when it is reached on the Calendar it be informally passed over, retaining its place.

Mr. TAULBEE. I am in favor of that, but would like to offer this suggestion as an amendment to it. I think it would meet the objection of the gentleman upon the other side if the call began where it rested last Friday evening, but with the understanding that we first take up for consideration such bills as were then passed over at the request of the members present.

Mr. LONG. I have no objection to that.

Mr. TAULBEE. We will save the calling of their bills in their order on the Calendar and thus save time, as my request will obviate the necessity of going over the whole list.

Mr. CHEADLE. I can state where we left off on last Friday evening. On page 63 of the Calendar, at bill No. 4504.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan as modified?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first bill on the Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 48, House bill 5961, to increase the pension now paid to Mrs. D. P. Woodbury.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I do not understand that there was any objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan, but only to the modification of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Ohio to object.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. As I understood the Chair to put the request of the gentleman from Michigan as modified, I objected. I have no objection to the original request.

Mr. FORD. Then I renew that request.

Mr. RYAN. There is no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection that order will be pursued. There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LIZZIE WRIGHT OWEN.

The first business on the Calendar called up by Mr. HERMANN was the bill (S. 42) granting a pension to Lizzie Wright Owen.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lizzie Wright Owen, only surviving daughter of George Wright, late a brigadier-general of United States Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month.

Mr. HERMANN. As the report is somewhat lengthy perhaps gentlemen may not object to my making a brief statement of what it embodies.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let us have the report. This is a peculiar case and we ought to have it read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio), as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 42) granting a pension to Lizzie Wright Owen, having considered the same, report it back with the recommendation that it do pass, and in support of this action adopt and make part hereof the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which is as follows:

"[Senate Report No. 177, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 42) granting a pension to Lizzie Wright Owen, have examined the same, and report:

"This bill passed the Senate in the last Congress, and your committee report it back again, recommending its passage, and submit their former report:

"'The claimant is the daughter of George Wright, late a brigadier-general of the United States volunteers. We append hereto the record of his distinguished military service furnished by the War Department, and a notice of his services and death which appeared at the time; also a copy of her petition, which states the grounds of her present claim, and other documents in support thereof.

"'She is now poor, and her physician in this city presents a statement of her present condition, that she is suffering with attacks of disease, increasing in severity, which will soon entirely disable her.

"'It will be observed that the extraordinary services and misfortunes detailed in this case prevent its forming a precedent to any extent for other applications, and to refuse this application would, in the opinion of your committee, be an exhibition of ingratitude unworthy the Republic.

"'We recommend the passage of the bill.'"

Mr. HERMANN. The remainder of the report consists only of the petition and some communications bearing upon the subject.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let the report be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the remainder of the report.

Mr. GLASS. That seems to be a very long report, and I think this bill ought to go over to a full House. I shall object to its consideration to-night.

Mr. HERMANN. May I ask the gentleman from Tennessee if he will indulge me for a moment? I am sure no gentleman will deliberately object to a measure of this character when acquainted with the circumstances. I desire to make this statement, and if the gentleman from Kentucky, Governor McCREARY, was present, he would corroborate largely what I desire now to say briefly. Unfortunately, however, he is not here, though he was present at the last time, expecting this case to be considered then.

This is the daughter of Maj. Gen. George Wright, who went down in a shipwreck on the coast of Oregon some twenty years ago on the ill-fated Brother Jonathan. This woman's mother was with him at the time. He was traveling to Portland, Oregon, with a number of soldiers, and in a great storm which overtook the ship she went down and all were lost. Her brother, Colonel Wright, was massacred in the Modoc massacre at the time he was gallantly leading his command into the conflict, about the same time that General Canby was killed. Under those circumstances she lost her brother, who had given her valuable support subsequently to the death of her father.

Her husband, who had rendered gallant service in the war, received wounds which ended his life. She is now without father, mother, brother, or husband, except one brother, who has been recently appointed to a position in the Supreme Court under this Administration, who, I understand, is now contributing to her support. Of the three persons who were her supporters I may say all of them gave their lives in the service of the country.

This woman is to-day penniless, up to a recent period working with her own hands for a livelihood. Never has this Government suffered to the extent of a single cent in the matter of a pension in any one of those cases, neither for the general who went down, nor the brother who died for his country in the Modoc difficulty, nor for her husband. So you will see this is certainly a meritorious case, and it is a case of very peculiar hardship. It is a case, it seems to me, in which the Government could very well afford to extend its gratuity under these peculiar circumstances. Being an exceptional case, I ask that this House shall do as it has done in so many other cases not possessing nearly the merit this case possesses. I hope the House will agree to grant the relief requested. The bill has passed the Senate unanimously, and it comes before the House with a unanimous report from the House Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. FORD. Does the gentleman say that this bill has passed the Senate?

Mr. HERMANN. It has.

Mr. MACDONALD. What other similar case has the House passed?

Mr. HERMANN. The House has passed a number of cases of much less merit. The House granted pensions to widows whose husbands were possibly of greater distinction, but in this case the widow did not receive a pension.

Mr. MACDONALD. Will the gentleman mention any such case?

Mr. HERMANN. You may take the case of the widow of General Ricketts or the widow of General Logan, and others.

A MEMBER. Those cases are quite different.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Why could this lady not be pensioned on account of her husband?

Mr. HERMANN. Her husband died after the war, when not in the service.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not rise to oppose this bill, but for the purpose of calling the attention of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to the fact that they have reported to the House a bill granting a pension to the invalid daughter of General Hackleman. In my experience in connection with the late war there has been no case of so high merit as that. I understand that the Committee on Invalid Pensions has reported a bill to pension the daughter at $18 a month; not a widow, but a daughter, as in this case.

I wish to say if this bill passes that I will ask the Committee on Invalid Pensions to put Mrs. Hackleman's pension on the same footing.

Mr. McMILLIN. If this bill is to pass at all, why not put the pension on the footing of a widow's pension? There is no ground on earth on which you can justify giving the daughter of a deceased soldier, who is not entitled to a pension at all under the law, $50 a month, while you give the widow of a man whose head was shot off in battle only $12 a month.

Mr. HERMANN. This lady is not only the daughter of a soldier, but she is the widow of a soldier.

Mr. McMILLIN. Why, then, can she not get a pension under the general law?

Mr. HERMANN. For the reason that her husband died after the war, when not in the service.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then she is not entitled to a pension under the general law; but you propose to give her more than you give to four women whose husbands were actually killed in battle.

Mr. HERMANN. I submit to the gentleman from Tennessee that the circumstances which surround this case are entirely exceptional.

Mr. McMILLIN. There are no more harrowing circumstances, of course, than those surrounding a woman who has to look at a dead husband. But the tendency of this kind of legislation is to build up classes and to grant larger pensions to widows on account of the former official standing of their husbands, ignoring the fact that all American citizens before the law are, or should be, on an equal footing.

Mr. HERMANN. Has the gentleman taken the same position with regard to other cases?

Mr. McMILLIN. I have, exactly. I have uniformly voted against granting these exorbitant pensions to one class while we give a mere pittance to others.

Mr. HERMANN. Does the gentleman think it is right and just that this House should make a discrimination in favor of those who possibly may have more influential friends or whose husbands may have borne more distinguished titles than others?

Mr. McMILLIN. No, sir; but you are going upon the idea that this woman has got fifty-dollar influence.

Mr. HERMANN. I do not claim it on that ground at all.

Mr. McMILLIN. I inferred that you did from the way you spoke.

Mr. HERMANN. Not at all, sir.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have tried in my action here to do equal justice to all, and I state now most candidly that my acumen is not sufficient to enable me to see that because a woman is the daughter or the widow of a deceased general she has any greater claim upon this Government than the daughter or the widow of a poor fellow who did not have any rank in the war, and who went out to fight not for the glory but for his country. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Chairman, since I observe that there is such opposition to this bill in its present form, as I do not wish to delay pension legislation here this evening, I will make a proposition which I believe will meet with the cordial indorsement of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN]. I will accept an amendment making this pension $30 instead of $50. That was suggested in this House some two or three weeks ago, but I declined then to accept the compromise, preferring to submit the case to the House upon its merits. Under the present circumstances, however, I will accept it.

Mr. McMILLIN. Why not put this woman on the same footing as we put the daughter of a man who was killed in battle? She is not entitled to any pension at all under the law. What is given is given as a gratuity. I am not objecting to that, because I propose always to resolve my doubts in favor of those who appear to have claims on the Government. I had not intended to open my mouth at all upon this subject, but I desire to say now, as a citizen of the United States and a representative of its people, that in my judgment we will legislate most wisely and most equitably when we make our laws uniform, and when we leave every American citizen to believe that he or she has the same right before the law as every other one has. I do not believe in building up classes in this country founded upon the standing or rank which individuals may have obtained. There is no higher standing in this country than American citizenship, and we have all got that. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. LYMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the galleries be cleared.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DOCKERY). If the applause is repeated the Chair will direct that the galleries be cleared.

Mr. MORRILL. I simply desire to say in behalf of the Committee on Invalid Pensions that I have no recollection of this bill having ever passed that committee. I do not want to be understood as saying that it did not pass, because I may not have been present when it was considered, but if I had been present I should have opposed it bitterly.

The principle adopted by the Committee on Invalid Pensions has been to allow pensions to invalid children who have passed the age of sixteen. Where a child is imbecile or crippled and helpless, we have gone to the extent of granting pensions to children over sixteen, but only in such cases. In the case of General Hackleman, who was killed in battle, we allowed her a pension of $18. We fixed upon that amount because she was a helpless invalid unable to take care of herself. We have established that rate in such cases—that is, in all of them that we have allowed, but we have only allowed pensions to children over sixteen years where they were invalids or helpless and compelled to depend upon charity for support. As I understand this case, the claimant is not an invalid, but is capable of taking care of herself.

Mr. HERMANN. She is an invalid.

Mr. MORRILL. I understood the gentleman to say she earned her living with her own hands. I move to amend this bill by striking out $50 and inserting $18.

Mr. McMILLIN. I suggest that the pension be fixed at the rate provided by law for a widow.

Mr. MORRILL. In the cases of imbecile children——

Mr. McMILLIN. But this is not such a case.

Mr. MORRILL. In those cases we have fixed the rate at $18 a month.

Mr. McMILLIN. I am in favor of granting pensions wherever they are deserved, but we do not popularize the system of pensions, nor do we satisfy the pensioners themselves when we place one class upon the rolls at a rate twice or three times as high as another class equally meritorious.

Now, I suggest to the gentleman from Oregon that he can get along easily with this bill by agreeing to make the pension the same that is allowed to other widows, and, as I have said, even that is beyond the law, because this is not a soldier's widow. She went from under her father's protection and married another man who did not lose his life in the service.

Mr. HERMANN. He lost his life from disabilities incurred in the service.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then the case comes under the general law, and if so, why does not she get her pension through the Pension Office?

Mr. HERMANN. Simply because she is unable to prove certain facts that the office requires proof of.

Mr. McMILLIN. Oh, yes. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL] by striking out "$18" and inserting "$12."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN].

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Chairman, before the vote is taken I desire to say a word in vindication of myself. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL] has suggested that he has no knowledge of this bill having passed the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. MORRILL. I said I was not present at the time.

Mr. HERMANN. Well, the gentleman who reported the bill from that committee is present this evening.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL] was present.

Mr. HERMANN. But, Mr. Chairman, rather than delay other pension legislation this evening, I will accept the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL]. I know, of course, that I have the power under the rules to delay all legislation until this measure can be properly considered with a full quorum of the House present, but I have too much patriotism, and, if it comes to that, too much humanity, to desire that other cases should be deferred by keeping this case standing in the way, and for that reason I will agree to accept the amendment making the pension $18, if that is the best proposition that gentlemen will permit to go through this evening.

I think the gentleman from Tennessee should be willing to consent to a pension of at least $18 or $20.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think this pension ought to be on the same footing as that of other widows.

Mr. SPOONER. If she is the widow of a captain the regular pension would be $20.

Mr. McMILLIN. But she is not the widow of a captain.

Mr. SPOONER. I understand she is.

Mr. McMILLIN. My understanding was different.

Mr. HERMANN. Her father was a general; her brother, a colonel; and her husband, as I understand, a captain. I will agree to $20 as a compromise.

Mr. McMILLIN. I thought the gentleman had accepted $18.

Mr. HERMANN. Very well; I will accept $18 rather than have further delay.

Mr. CHEADLE. I wish to say that we ought in these matters to follow the law. One-half an hour of the valuable time of the House this evening has been occupied in the consideration of a case that is to be rated outside of the ratings of the law. No greater truth was ever uttered than that uttered by the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] when he said that there is no higher title on this earth than that of American citizenship.

Mr. HERMANN. We all know that.

Mr. CHEADLE. And what is the pride of American citizenship if it be not that we are equal under the law? I shall object to the consideration of every one of these special bills unless there is a constitutional quorum present. I want to say to my Republican colleagues that the great central idea around which our party has rallied since its organization has been the equality of citizenship under the law. I have letters by the score from men of the rank and file of the Army, who have thanked me for the words I have said here in speaking for the equality of citizenship under the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the position of the question. This bill proposes to grant a pension of $50. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL] has moved to amend by striking out "50" and inserting "18;" and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] has moved to amend the amendment by striking out "18" and inserting "12." The first question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MCMILLIN'S amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MORRILL, to strike out "50" and insert "18," it was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move to further amend by striking out the words "only surviving daughter of George Wright, late brigadier-general of United States volunteers," and inserting "widow of —— Owen, a soldier in the late war." I do not know what her husband's full name was; but my object is to put this pension upon the ground on which it ought to be granted. The fact that this woman is the daughter or granddaughter of somebody who was a general ought to be no foundation for a pension. I voted against pensioning the granddaughter of Thomas Jefferson, the author of the Declaration of Independence.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MCMILLIN, it was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHANNA LOEWINGER.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (S. 739) granting a pension to Johanna Loewinger.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I call for the consideration of this bill. I am going to call for the consideration of every bill as it is reached on the Calendar.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Johanna Loewinger, widow of Charles Loewinger, deceased, late of Company E, Twenty-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio), which was read in part, the further reading being dispensed with on motion of Mr. GUENTHER, is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 739) granting a pension to Johanna Loewinger, having considered the same, report it back with the recommendation that it do pass, and in support of this action adopt and make part hereof the report of the Committee on Pensions of the Senate, which is as follows:

"[Senate Report No. 205, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

"Charles Loewinger, the husband of the widow now claiming a pension, enlisted June 13, 1861, in Company E, Twenty-eighth Ohio Volunteers. Discharged for disability May 18, 1862. Application for a pension filed January 27, 1865, for chronic diarrhea and ulceration of the bowels. He died July 17, 1876. His widow filed her application to be put upon the pension-roll March 31, 1880; claim rejected July 25, 1885.

"The medical reviewer rejects the claim of the widow on the ground 'that the soldier committed suicide, as shown by the verdict of the coroner's jury, and his death in this manner is not considered the result of chronic diarrhea, nor chargeable in any way to his military service.' If the above finding is sustained by the evidence filed with the widow's application there could be no question that her claim had been properly rejected. On a careful analyses of the testimony the committee can not agree with the finding of the Pension Office, and is satisfied that the evidence clearly supports the opposite conclusion.

"The verdict of the coroner's jury finds: 'The deceased came to his death from suicide by cutting his throat with a razor, caused by long-continued illness.'

"This verdict is supported as to the cause of his suicide by an overwhelming amount of testimony.

"The 'certificate of disability for discharge' finds him 'incapable of performing the duties of a soldier, because of chronic ulceration of the mucous membrane of the colon, resulting from an attack of camp fever contracted while on Big Sewell Mountain, in October, 1861, marked by excessive exhaustive diarrhea, occasional hemorrhage of the bowels, and such reduction of strength that he is utterly unfit for service.'

"The evidence of a number of physicians, as well as his neighbors, embracing the period from the date of his discharge to the hour of his death, conclusively proves that his disease, for which he was discharged from the service, continued, without intermission, during that whole period, and that he suffered excessive pain and was totally unfit to perform any labor, and that during the latter years of his life he was confined to his house, and most of the time to his bed; that his condition preyed upon his mind, and at times it was seriously affected.

"Dr. G. C. Werner, who attended him during the last years of his illness and at the time of his death, testified that—

"'The soldier became affected with melancholy and became very debilitated several months before he committed suicide; that affiant never had any doubt but that the chronic diarrhea, from which he was continuously suffering, was the immediate cause of his melancholy; that death was not caused by cutting his throat, as affiant sewed up the wound and there were no arteries severed, and that, in affiant's opinion, he could not have lived more than a few days longer, as he was then in a dying condition from chronic diarrhea.'"

"This statement is supported by the affidavits of Neland Frentz, Dr. F. L. Emmert, Annie N. Rohrer, Mary Byer, Frank Geiler, Carl Keneher, and Carl Lirche.

"The medical reviewer, July 14, 1885, upon these facts, in referring the cause to the chief of the medical division, said: 'As the case now stands we must, in my opinion, accept death as due to diarrhea, and not to the wound in the throat.'

"This conclusion, which the committee think is fully sustained by the testimony, was reached after the medical reviewer had commented upon the case, May 6, 1885, and the medical referee himself had called for further testimony June 12, 1885.

"It is clear from the evidence that the pensioner was the victim of painful, exhausting, and debilitating disease; that no cause other than this disease is pretended to have existed which could have affected the mind of the husband of the petitioner and caused him to take his life. And it is fair to conclude that at the time he made the attempt on his life his mind, by reason of the disease contracted in the service, was seriously affected. And the evidence of the physician that he did not die from the injury inflicted, but as the result of his debilitated condition resulting from that disease, seems to your committee conclusive of the case.

"The conclusion of the committee in this case is fully sustained by the decisions and rulings of the Pension Bureau, found in the 'Digest of Pension Laws and Decisions,' pages 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 279.

"Your committee would report the bill favorably, after amending the title so as to read: 'A bill granting a pension to Johanna Loewinger;' and by striking out, in line 6, the word 'Johnanna' and inserting in lieu thereof the word 'Johanna.'"

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BERRY DAY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 737) granting a pension to Berry Day.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Berry Day, father of A. L. Day, deceased, late of Company I, Fifth Regiment Ohio Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill S. 737, having considered the same, report it back and recommend its passage, and in support of this action adopt and make part hereof the report of Senate Committee on Pensions, which is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 140, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

This claim was rejected by the Bureau of Pensions March 4, 1886, upon the ground that the claimant was not dependent upon the soldier for support at the date of his death.

The claimant is now eighty-one years of age. His only son, A. L. Day, of Company I, Fifth Ohio Infantry Valunteers, was killed at the battle of Cedar Mountain, in August, 1862. His mother died in 1847.

At the time of the soldier's death the father owned a house worth about $2,000, which was under a mortgage of $1,000. He had also about $500 in personal property, and this was all of his estate. S. W. Reud and John W. Fisher depose that the son worked for his father up to near the time of his enlistment, and, as deponents understood, contributed his wages to aid his father. The claimant's business (trading in horses) was a constant loss to him until 1858, when he disposed of the last vestige of his property, and has ever since been supported by the labor of his second wife and by the Odd Fellows.

Mrs. Kate Fisher, sister of the deceased, deposes that this soldier sent her money nearly every pay-day to aid their father in supporting the family, amounting to some $25 or $30, and that he sent to his father much larger sums.

The report of the board of examining surgeons, dated October 15, 1882, states that the claimant is incapable of supporting himself, and that the disability is senility.

The passage of this bill is recommended.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZA DOUGLASS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 339) granting a pension to Eliza Douglass.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the penson-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Eliza Douglass, dependent mother of James Douglass, late of Company H, Fifth Regiment Colored Troops.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 339) granting a pension to Eliza Douglass, having considered the same, report it back and recommend its passage, and in support of this action adopt and make part hereof the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which is as follows:

"[Senate Report No. 49, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

"This is a claim for a pension by Eliza Douglass, as the dependent mother of James Douglass, a private in Company H, Fifth Regiment of Colored Troops.

"The proof in this case seems to be sufficient to show that the soldier, James Douglass, who enlisted on the 15th of June, 1863, and was discharged September 20, 1865, contracted the disease of which he subsequently died, April 15, 1870, whilst in the service of the United States and in the line of duty.

"The facts which would ordinarily justify the granting of a pension to the mother of a deceased soldier appear to be sufficiently established by the evidence. The only question presented by the record adverse to the claimant, Eliza Douglass, as the dependent mother of James Douglass, is the fact that the proof is conclusive that at the time of the death of the said James Douglass he left a widow, who some time subsequent to his death married.

"Section 4707 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides—

"'If any person embraced within the provisions of sections 4692 and 4693 has died since the 4th day of March, 1861, or shall hereafter die by reason of any wound, injury, casualty, or disease which under the conditions and limitations of such sections would have entitled him to an invalid pension, and has not left or shall not leave a widow or legitimate child, but has left or shall leave other relative or relatives who were dependent upon him for support in whole or in part at the date of his death, such relative or relatives shall be entitled in the following order of precedence to receive the same pension as such person would have been entitled to had he been totally disabled, to commence at the death of such person.'

"This section clearly contemplates that the right of a dependent relative to a pension shall accrue only in those cases in which the soldier dying has not left a 'widow' or 'legitimate child.'

"Section 4708 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides—

"'The remarriage of any widow, dependent mother, or dependent sister entitled to pension shall not bar her right to such pension to the date of her remarriage.' * * *

"'But on the remarriage of any widow, dependent mother, or dependent sister having a pension, such pension shall cease.'

"The committee know of no provision of law which authorizes the substitution of a dependent mother to the rights which the law gives to the widow of a deceased soldier in case said widow should marry after the death of her husband, section 4708 not applying to such a case.

"This view was taken by the Pension Bureau in the above claim, and the right of the claimant to a pension denied on this construction of the law. Under these circumstances the action of the Commissioner of Pensions in rejecting the claim was correct under the law as it exists.

"But the committee in this case feel compelled to report the above bill favorably under the circumstances disclosed by this record, and recommend that the bill be passed."

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, last Friday I was present, as I have been almost every pension night, and the rule has been for the Calendar to be gone through with and to consider bills which are not objected to. Under that rule gentlemen have passed four or five bills which they have had an interest in in behalf of soldiers' widows in the State from which they come. I have introduced bills now upon the Calendar which were in the interest of soldiers of the State of New Jersey. It was understood last Friday that to-night bills were to be taken up beginning where we left off on last Friday. I do not see any possible way of reaching bills in the interest of New Jersey unless we clear the Calendar as we go along. If we had gone on in that way we would have gotten through the Calendar by this time, and could have commenced again at the beginning, but as we have gone on I do not see any chance to reach the bills in which I am interested. Now, I would rather go on and consider the bills as they come up on the Calendar and dispose of them. But if the committee will agree to take up the Calendar where we left off on last Friday, so that we may consider such cases as are called up, then I am willing to withdraw all further objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the pending bill.

There was no objection, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

C. R. THOMAS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S 335) granting a pension to C. R. Thomas.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be passed over.

MARY E. JOHNSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 337) granting a pension to Mary E. Johnson.

Mr. FINLEY. I would like to say to the gentleman from New Jersey that if he undertakes to call up bills in every case when they are reached, without the request of the gentlemen who are interested, it may be that they would not regard it as courteous on his part.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be passed over.

MANON VANGORDEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 330) granting a pension to Manon Vangorden.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be passed over.

JOHN GERMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3504) for the relief of John German.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be passed over.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

Bills of the following titles were passed over, no member asking for their consideration:

A bill (H. R. 5752) for the relief of Julia Triggs;

A bill (H. R. 5751) for the relief of Margaret M. Hatch; and

A bill (S. 1638) granting a pension to William Richardson.

JOHN TAYLOR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2656) to increase the pension of John Taylor.

Mr. CHEADLE. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to increase the pension of John Taylor, late of Battery M, Third New York Light Artillery, from $12 to $16 per month, on account of gunshot wound of the head and its results.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2656) to increase the pension of John Taylor, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

A similar bill was before the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the Forty-ninth Congress, and their report thereon is as follows:

"The applicant for pension is now receiving a pension of $12 a month by an act of Congress approved May 4, 1882.

"On the 5th day of November, 1884, he applied to the Department for an increase on account of disabilities incurred while in the service, and was rejected by the Department upon the certificate of the examining board, made November 4, 1885, which is as follows:

"'Ball entered 2 inches below and behind the right angle of the mouth, injuring the inferior maxilla and passing through the structure of the lower portion of the mouth, coming out an inch above and to the left of the pomum Adami; cicatrices are depressed and adherent; there is considerable alilia, probably owing to the injury of the nerves of the tongue; there is no external evidence of injury to the left shoulder, but there is apparent slight loss of sensation of face and of left shoulder.

"'Examining Surgeon S. A. Lumly certifies to gunshot wound fracturing inferior maxillary right jaw; ball entering lower border of the inferior maxillary, passing inwards and emerging from left jaw below inferior maxillary, removing several molars and causing partial paralysis of vocal organs and impairing speech; considerable pain in cold weather; atrophied condition of left jaw; facial neuralgia; health impaired; degrees of disability permanent.'

"Examining Surgeon George Kellog and others certify substantially as last above, and add that articulation is much impaired; that claimant at times is unable to speak; has difficulty in mastication. Claimant says his articulation was perfect before he was wounded; has loss of power in left arm and hand; circulation slightly impaired, probably due to injury to filaments of cavical flexus.

"The claimant claims an increase of disability on account of the injuries received while in the service.

"He has personally appeared before the committee, and it is evident that he is incapable of using his left arm so that he may earn his livelihood by manual labor; that he is also afflicted with a painful and embarrassing stammering of his speech, arising from the gunshot wound above referred to.

"From the evidence presented, and his personal appearance and examination by the committee, the committee are of the opinion that claimant is entitled to a further rating than he already has, namely, $16 per month, and that the bill be amended by striking out the words 'twenty-four,' in lines 7 and 8, and inserting instead thereof the word 'sixteen.'"

The bill then under consideration passed both Houses of Congress, but was vetoed by the President on the ground that the increase allowed under the act approved May 4, 1882, "when applied for at the Pension Bureau in 1885, was denied, on the ground that the rate he was receiving was commensurate with the degree of his disability, a board of surgeons having reported that he was receiving a liberal rating."

Your committee concede that the disability is liberally rated on the basis provided by law, i. e., ability to perform manual labor, and that is as far as the Pension Bureau is permitted under the terms of the law to go. But this case is of a different character. It is not as much claimant's inability to perform manual labor which induces him to come to Congress for relief as his inability to procure employment by reason of the very serious impairment of his speech. Impairment of speech and deafness alike, while not an interference in the performance of manual labor, subject the unfortunate individual to much embarrassment in obtaining employment, and Congress already has taken the necessary steps to grant relief to those who are totally deaf.

Recognizing the merit of the bill under consideration, your committee report favorably on the same, and ask that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

W. A. LEMASTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 647) for the relief of W. A. Lemaster; which was passed over, no member asking for its consideration.

HANNAH H. LATHAM.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3506) for the relief of Hannah H. Latham; which was passed over, no member asking for its consideration.

B. S. VAN BUREN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3568) for the relief of B. S. Van Buren.

Mr. TAULBEE. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations of the pension laws, the name of Barent S. Van Buren, late a musician in the Fourth Regiment of Illinois Cavalry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3568) for the relief of B. S. Van Buren, submit the following report:

The case of Barent S. Van Buren, formerly a musician of the Fourth Illinois Cavalry Volunteers (claim for invalid pension No. 389982), was rejected by the Pension Office September 17, 1885, on the ground that the evidence on file in the case did not show that tumors of breast and thigh originated in the service and the line of duty.

The history of this case is as follows: Soldier, who was the son of Judge E. Van Buren, of Chicago, was a musician and joined the regiment composed of the Fourth Illinois Cavalry Volunteers in October, 1861; was discharged with the other members of the band at Cairo in the spring of 1862. The testimony on file in this case in the Pension Office goes to show that soldier contracted tumors of chest, abdomen, and thigh, on the march from Fort Henry to Fort Donelson, Tennessee, in February, 1862. The weather was wet and cold, and the constant riding day and night, and the constant exposure, brought on sickness, which resulted in said tumors, which were hard and soft alternately and at times suppurated; always tender and troublesome.

These tumors existed at the date of discharge in April, 1862, and Dr. Joseph W. Freer, who treated him immediately after arriving home after discharge for these tumors, is dead, and soldier has been unable to furnish the testimony of a commissioned officer of the regiment as to the incurrence of his disability in the service, owing to the fact that the members of the band were not with the regiment when traversing the country from Fort Henry to Fort Donelson, Tennessee.

He has furnished the testimony of the different members of the band who were with him at the time, and to whom he showed his tumors at Randolph Forges in February, 1862, after the ride across the country.

The testimony shows that he was a strong, healthy man when he enlisted, by parties who knew him. This is shown by several witnesses, and that he was afflicted as above set forth on his return from the Army. It is certain from the testimony on file that this man was sound and well when he enlisted, and it is equally certain that he was discharged because of his sickness which he contracted after his enlistment. It seems that by an equitable construction this claimant contracted this disability while in the service and in line of duty.

Therefore the committee recommend that this bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

Bills of the following titles were passed over, no members asking for their consideration:

A bill (H. R. 8291) granting a pension to Julia Welch;

A bill (H. R. 5123) to increase the pension of Charles Ritchey;

A bill (H. R. 4182) granting a pension to Elizabeth Jones;

A bill (H. R. 3509) granting a pension to Harriet I. Peabody; and

A bill (H. R. 7932) granting a pension to Mary Calvert Truxtun.

MRS. F. SELINA BUCHANAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1985) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. F. Selina Buchanan.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. F. Selina Buchanan, widow of the late McKean Buchanan, of the United States Navy, and pay her a pension of $50 per month, in lieu of the amount she is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred Senate bill 1985, adopt the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, and recommend the passage of the bill.

"The petitioner, Mrs. F. Selina Buchanan, is the widow of the late McKean Buchanan, who, at the time of his death, March 18, 1871, was pay director in the United States Navy, with the rank of commodore (the highest attainable by officers of his grade), assimilated to that of brigadier-general in the Army.

"Pay Director Buchanan entered the Navy in 1826, and participated in two wars. By act of Congress of December 21, 1861, limiting the term of active service to forty-five years of service, or to sixty-two years of age, he was retired from service, he having been born in 1798. Although by this law permitted to withdraw from active duty, he remained at his post on board the frigate Congress until she was sunk in Hampton Roads, March 9, 1862. During the engagement with the Merrimac on the date named he commanded the berth-deck division and performed gallant service until the sinking of the ship.

"Being at that time sixty-four years of age, the shock to his system was such that his health was seriously undermined, and his death was the result.

"By the act of March 3, 1871, revising the various naval grades, Paymaster Buchanan was raised to the grade of pay director (then newly created) with the rank of commodore, but his death occurred two weeks later, on March 18, 1871, before the issuance of his commission.

"In view of the foregoing facts, of the decedent's long and valuable services, of the widow's advanced age, she being over eighty-three years old, and in view of the further fact that there are now, or were not long since, on the pension-rolls the widows of ten admirals, four commodores, and a number of other officers of the Navy and Marine Corps, receiving $50 per month, your committee recommend that the prayer of the petitioner be granted, and they submit herewith a bill increasing her pension from $30 to $50."

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. CHEADLE. I object.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no desire to discuss the general propositions contained in this bill. It is so thoroughly in keeping with every bill reported from the Committee of the Whole, having passed the Senate and been reported from the House committee, that I can not understand the gentleman's objection. But I desire to be consistent with the record that the House has made on every bill submitted embodying this proposition, and as the gentleman, I am sure, desires to be consistent in his opposition to the principle involved, I am perfectly willing to entertain any suggestion coming from the committee with reference to the bill, in order that it may not delay proceedings with respect to other bills following it on the Calendar and yet at the same time give to the bill consideration of the same character that other bills have always received.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the bill by striking out "fifty" and inserting "thirty-five."

Mr. BINGHAM. I shall not object to letting the bill go to the House on such an amendment as that. I only want the House to pass upon the question.

Mr. CHEADLE. I object to $35 as well as fifty.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman offer an amendment?

Mr. CHEADLE. No, sir. I am not in charge of the bill. I will state to my colleague on the committee that a number of similar cases have been set down for the 28th of the month, directly after the reading of the Journal, and I am perfectly willing that this bill shall take the same course.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman submit any motion?

Mr. CHEADLE. I move to amend by inserting $30 per month.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is what she now gets. I am willing, if it be the judgment of the committee to fix $35 as the rate, to let the House pass upon the question involved, as it has done in similar cases.

Mr. FORD. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit a suggestion.

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. FORD. Why not allow it to take the same course as the other bills set for consideration in the House on the 28th of May?

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no objection to that, as I have said. Does the gentleman mean at $35?

Mr. FORD. No; just as it stands.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. TAULBEE. Let the recommendation of the committee be that the bill go over to the 28th day of May with the previous question ordered, but with the right of amendment, and with fifteen minutes' debate on each side.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am perfectly willing for that.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

Mr. MORRILL. If that agreement is entered into I will withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection this bill will be reported to the House with the understanding that a vote is to be taken on it in the House on the 28th day of May, following the bills which have been similarly reported for consideration on that day, with fifteen minutes' debate on each side and the previous question being considered as ordered, with the right, however, to offer amendments.

There was no objection.

ANDREW FRANKLIN, ALIAS M'KEE.

The next bill on the Calendar, the consideration of which was asked by Mr. RYAN, was the bill (S. 626) granting an increase of pension to Andrew Franklin, alias McKee.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Andrew Franklin, alias McKee, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving under an act of Congress approved February 28, 1885.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

They recommend the favorable consideration thereof, and adopt the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, as follows:

"The claimant was a soldier in the Mexican war, and is now about ninety-five years of age. By special act, approved February 28, 1885, he was granted a pension at $8 per month. He now asks for an increase of the same to $30 per month. The testimony which was produced before the committee at the time the bill granting him a pension was pending shows that the claimant saw hard service in the war with Mexico and was wounded in action.

"On account of the great age, the infirmities, and the total dependence of the claimant, the committee are of opinion that the increase should be allowed. They therefore recommend the passage of the bill."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MOSES L. CHASE.

The next business on the Calendar, the consideration of which was asked by Mr. GROUT, was the bill (H. R. 7471) granting a pension to Moses L. Chase.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be hereby directed to put upon the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and restrictions of the pension laws, the name of Moses L. Chase, a private in Company M, First Vermont Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7471) granting a pension to Moses L. Chase, having considered the same, report as follows:

The claimant was a private in Company M, First Vermont Cavalry, being enrolled August 27, 1864, for three years. The records show that soldier participated in several battles. It is also shown that he had hospital service at Chappel Point, Md., for intermittent fever; at the Armory Square Hospital, Washington, D. C., for chronic diarrhea, and at the Baxter Hospital, Burlington, Vt., and the Sloan Hospital, Montpelier, Vt., for the latter disease. His treatment at Montpelier, Vt., was in June, 1865, shortly after which he was mustered out.

Soldier made application for pension, alleging chronic diarrhea, and also kidney disease, resulting from being thrown from a horse at Harper's Ferry, W. Va., by which his back was severely injured.

There is medical evidence on file showing that soldier is now incurably sick with kidney and bladder disease, the board of examining surgeons of Newport, Vt., giving this opinion, and there is also both medical and lay evidence showing that when he came home from the army he was very feeble with chronic diarrhea and kidney disease.

The case was submitted for special examination to Homer Riggs, and after a very thorough inquiry the examiner made a favorable report, closing as follows:

"The evidence of Samuel F. Stearns, who is considered one of the most reliable men in his town, shows beyond a reasonable doubt that the soldier was thrown from a horse and hurt, and was taken up by his comrades unconscious. From the evidence before me, I am of the opinion that the claim is meritorious."

Notwithstanding this favorable finding, the claim was rejected, and as your committee are fully persuaded that the claim is a thoroughly just one, and that a hardship has been done the soldier by its rejection in the Pension Office, report it back favorably and recommend its passage, with an amendment substituting the word "place" for the word "put" in the third line.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LAURA L. WALLEN.

Mr. McKINNEY. I inadvertently allowed the bill just preceding this on the Calendar to be passed over. I now ask that it be considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5593) granting an increase of pension to Laura L. Wallen.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension to Laura L. Wallen, widow of Henry D. Wallen, late colonel of the Second Infantry, United States Army, to the sum of $50 per month.

Mr. McKINNEY. I do not desire to consider this bill now; but I ask that it go over to the 28th of May, under the same conditions precisely as those bills preceding it.

Mr. CARUTH. I do not object to the request of the gentleman; but how are we to dispose of the number of bills which are fixed for that day?

Mr. RYAN. If not disposed of on that day they will go over to another day.

Mr. CARUTH. I have a bill set for consideration on that day which I do not want interfered with.

Mr. McKINNEY. This will not interfere with it or any previous bills.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let us have the report read.

The report (by Mr. RUSSELL, of Connecticut) was read, as follows:

That Laura L. Wallen is the widow of Henry D. Wallen, who at the time of his death, December, 1887, was colonel of Second Infantry. The records of the War Department show that Colonel Wallen was appointed in 1836 and served in the Mexican war, and in each grade of promotion upon the frontier, until his death, which was from disease contracted upon the frontier of Arizona. The most notable service of Colonel Wallen's life, in obedience to orders most distasteful to an officer anxious for military distinction and rank, was performed during the late war.

His knowledge of the Indian tribes and his great tact and judgment in dealing with them pointed to him as a man suited to the arduous and delicate task of dealing with the warlike tribes of Apaches and Navajoes on the frontier of New Mexico. Though averse to this service in the condition of the country, as his letters to the War Department, to President Lincoln, and to the Military Committee of the Senate show, he complied with the orders of the Secretary of War with such zeal and energy that though commanding but three companies of his regiment, composed of fresh volunteers, he kept the frontier, that for a century had been exposed to the violence of savage tribes, in a condition of peace that it had rarely known.

About 9,000 Indians were brought into a reservation, disarmed, and induced to labor, land was reclaimed by irrigation, crops planted and harvested in peace, while all the energies of the Government were engaged in the prodigious work of war. The value of this frontier service can scarcely be overrated; but for the discretion and executive ability of Colonel Wallen the whole frontier of New Mexico would have blazed with the fires of savage warfare, and the Government embarrassed at a time when it had no forces to spare.

This continuous service in a hot and unhealthful region broke down Colonel Wallen's health, and after years of suffering he died, leaving a widow, advanced in years, and an invalid daughter dependent upon a pension of $30 per month.

In view of Colonel Wallen's services, and the present condition of his widow, the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I would like to ask the gentleman from New Hampshire on what ground it is asked that an increase shall be given in this case beyond that given in other cases of a similar character?

Mr. MCKINNEY. Because of the services given to his country, and because the widow to-day is entirely dependent upon her pension. We have many precedents for this kind of increase.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish the gentleman would name some of them, because I am not familiar with any.

Mr. MCKINNEY. I think there are quite a number, if the gentleman will look.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I ask the gentleman from Kansas if that is the course of his committee?

Mr. MORRILL. The Committee on Invalid Pensions never recommended such a case. Indeed, in the case of Colonel Hendricks, who was killed in battle, the committee reported adversely on a similar application.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. This case comes from the Committee on Pensions?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCKINNEY. I do not object to the bill going over to the 28th of May, under the same order as has been adopted with regard to other bills. The House can then discuss the bill, and can pass it or kill it, as it pleases.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let it go over with the right to offer amendments.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not object to the bill going over with the right to be voted on in the House. But I do object seriously to the practice of selecting out some cases of this class to the exclusion of others.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri). Is there objection to the proposition that the bill shall go over to be considered in the House under the conditions which have been stated?

There was no objection, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation stated.

EVELINE M. ALEXANDER.

The next bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. SAWYER) was the bill (H. R. 4578) granting a pension to Eveline M. Alexander, widow of Bvt. Brig. Gen. Andrew J. Alexander.

Mr. SAWYER. This is a bill where a widow is now receiving a pension of $30. The bill recommends a pension of $50 per month. Her husband was wounded while serving in the Army with the rank of brigadier-general. I ask that this bill take the same course as others and be considered in the House on the 28th of May under the same order, with the right to offer amendments.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let the bill and report be read.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands, the gentleman who calls up this bill does not desire to have the bill now considered.

Mr. SAWYER. I ask to have it considered merely to the extent of its being ordered to take the same course as the others.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If that action is to be taken, the bill and the report should be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Eveline M. Alexander, and rate her pension at $50 per month, which shall be in lieu of the pension she now receives.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4578) granting a pension to Eveline M. Alexander, widow of Bvt. Brig. Gen. Andrew J. Alexander, submit the following report:

It appears from the report of the Adjutant-General, on file in the Pension Office, that General Alexander entered the regular Army of the United States July 26, 1861, as second lieutenant, and remained until May 4, 1887, when he died, holding the rank of lieutenant-colonel. He served as adjutant-general of the Third Army Corps of Army of the Potomac, and of the Seventeenth Corps of the Department of the Tennessee. Served as chief of staff to General Stoneman, commanding Department of the Tennessee, and also inspector-general in 1865. Subsequently served with his regiment and in other capacities in Arkansas, New Mexico, Arizona, Colorado, Texas, and Montana. That in 1865 he was retired from active service in consequence of disabilities incurred in the line of duty as an officer of the Army.

It appears that in 1865 he commanded the Second Brigade, Fourth Division Cavalry Corps, Military Division of the Mississippi.

Mrs. Alexander is now receiving a pension of $30 per month as the widow of a lieutenant-colonel.

The evidence shows that she is a lady, in ordinary circumstances, with a young son, about twelve years of age, and at that age when the expenses of education are rapidly increasing.

The letter from General Wilson, one of the most distinguished cavalry officers of the Army, addressed to one of the committee, is annexed hereto and made a part of this report.

The committee believe that this lady, the widow of so distinguished an officer, who bravely commanded a brigade while in active service, who was in fact a brevet brigadier-general, there being no vacancy in the full rank, is under the circumstances fairly entitled to the relief this bill seeks to give, and therefore recommend that the bill pass.

WASHINGTON, March 14, 1888.

SIR: I beg to call your attention to the claim of Eveline M. Alexander, wife of the late General Andrew S. Alexander, for an increase of pension.

It was my good fortune to know General Alexander during the rebellion—appointed into the Army from Missouri, and by conspicuous merit rose to the command of a brigade of cavalry in the corps which I had the honor of organizing and commanding. Prior to that he was a lieutenant-colonel and assistant adjutant-general of the Seventeenth Army Corps, on the staff of his brother-in-law, Maj. Gen. Frank Blair.

After serving with me as chief of staff through the Nashville campaign, during which he rendered most valuable service, I secured for him the rank of brevet brigadier-general (it being understood that he could not be appointed to the full rank because there were no vacancies in that grade), and assigned him to the command of a brigade of cavalry in Upton's (Fourth) division, which command he held during the final campaign through Alabama and Georgia, with which the war was ended. He greatly distinguished himself in the battles at Montevallo, Ebenezer Church, the assault and capture of Selma, the passage of the Alabama, the assault and capture of Columbus, Ga., and finally in the operations which resulted in the capture of Jefferson Davis.

In all these battles and operations he was conspicuous for the energy, courage, activity, and ability with which he commanded and led his brigade. He was constantly under my observation, and I most cheerfully bear witness to his high qualities and character, as well as to the untiring industry and persistency with which he performed every duty.

I was personally a witness to an incident which I do not doubt was proximately the cause of his death. During the passage of the Alabama by the corps on a ponton bridge, built for the occasion, Alexander, with a small boat and crew, was trying to protect the bridge from the drift-wood with which the river was filled by the rapidly rising flood. An enormous tree caught his frail craft between it and the bridge, overturned the craft, threw the general into the water, and as he arose to the surface and seized the bow one of the pontons caught and crowded him almost to death.

"He was rescued with great difficulty; two of his ribs were broken, his back was severely injured, and his lungs badly bruised. Twenty-two years afterwards, while suffering from disease directly the result of his long and faithful services, he died from the bursting of an abcess on his lungs, which I doubt not had its origin from the injury just described. He was at the time in the line of his duty as a brigadier-general, and it was not his fault that he did not hold the full rank. He was regularly assigned to command before that date as a brevet brigadier-general, and for all purposes of the military service and for the law he was just as much a brigadier-general as a dozen appointments to that grade could have made him. He commanded and was obeyed as such, he was injured as such, and now that he is dead, leaving his wife and young son dependent upon the justice and liberality of his country, I submit that they should receive a pension according to his services and command as a brigadier-general and not according to the lineal rank he had when he died.

"I am well acquainted with Mrs. Alexander and her father's family, one of the most distinguished in New York, and am sure she has no support and no means of educating her young son except what she derives from the small pension now allowed her and from the meager saving from her husband's army pay, which he invested several years before he became disabled.

"She needs, and ought to have, the largest pension ever paid under such circumstances, and no one who will take time to read the little volume I prepared and which his wife published, giving an account of his life and services, can doubt the justice of this conclusion.

"He was a brave, virtuous, heroic soldier, and of the highest character in all the relations of life, and as the actual commission of brigadier-general of volunteers could have imposed no additional service, danger, or command upon him. I trust his widow's petition may be promptly granted. He who gives quickly, gives twice. In this case I hope there will be no delay.

"If deemed necessary, I will cheerfully make affidavit to the truth of the foregoing statement.

Perhaps I should add that General Alexander was also the brother-in-law of Major General Upton, of New York, and that young Upton Alexander is now the sole representative of those two most gallant and patriotic soldiers and is dependent upon this increased pension for the education a boy of such lineage should receive.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES H. WILSON,
Late Maj. Gen. Vol., Comdg. Cav. Corps M. D. M., and Brevet Maj. Gen., U. S. A.

HON. JOHN G. SAWYER,
House of Representatives.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion that the bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it shall go over for consideration in the House on the 28th of May, with the previous question ordered, fifteen minutes of debate on each side, and the right to offer amendments. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

HARLOW B. HYDE.

The next business on the Private Calendar, called up for consideration by Mr. SAWYER, was the bill (S. 1477) granting a pension to Harlow B. Hyde.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Harlow B. Hyde, dependent father of George B. Hyde, late a private in Company C, Second Wisconsin Infantry.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1477) granting a pension to Harlow B. Hyde, submit the following report:

The committee, from an examination of the very full statement of the facts as contained in the report of the Senate committee on this bill, hereto attached and made a part hereof, find that this is a meritorious claim, and therefore they recommend that the bill do pass.

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Harlow B. Hyde, have examined the same, and report:

Harlow B. Hyde is the father of George B. Hyde, late private in Company C, Second Wisconsin Infantry. From the record testimony it is shown that the soldier was enrolled on the 22d day of April, 1861; that he was wounded in action August 28, 1862; that he received his wound at the battle of Gainesville, and that he died from its effects on the 10th of September, 1862. The father claims that he was dependent upon his said son at the time of his enlistment, and on the 17th of April, 1883, he filed an application for a pension. The claim was rejected October 7, 1885, on the ground that the claimant's physical condition was not satisfactorily shown, neither his property or income at that date; that the contributions from his son are shown by the testimony of the family, which consisted of himself—the mother having died before the war—and a daughter nineteen years of age.

Apart from his immediate household he had a married son, aged twenty-nine, three unmarried sons, two of whom were in the Army. Another objection to the allowance of his claim consisted in his having a home, which he sold for $1,000, from the proceeds of which $150 had to go for debts. It is also held that the evidence does not show that his physical infirmities prevented his earning a living. He appealed from the decision of the Commissioner, but the Secretary of the Interior sustained the rejection.

The committee are of the opinion that there is ample proof, independent of that contributed by claimant's family, to show that he was dependent upon his son for support, and it consists in the fact that the son lived with his father before and at the time of his enlistment; that he labored for his father's maintenance, and in the well-established fact that the father was unable to labor for his own support.

Dr. L. F. Benedick, Winooski, Vt., testifies as follows:

"Has attended claimant for the last fourteen years (prior to July 3, 1883, covering a period from 1869) for rheumatism. Is unable to give dates, as his pecuniary circumstances forbade the idea of much pay. When able to pay he did so at the time of service. Also had a right inguinal hernia. Since 1869 has been quite infirm. That his age is now seventy-nine. Know him to be truthful, honest, and industrious, when able to work, and too proud to ask the Government for a pension if he did not believe it to be his legal and moral right."

The surgeon's certificate of examination, made at Burlington, Vt., describes his condition as follows:

"We find an elastic soft tumor in right groin. It protrudes from external abdominal ring; is size of butternut, or about 1½ inches in diameter. It is an oblique inguinal hernia. He has moderately varicose veins of right leg. The facts of duration of above condition are not within our personal knowledge, but in our best judgment these conditions were present for several years previous to late war. We also believe that in consequence of such disabilities he was unfitted for manual labor."

Then follows the rating, which is total.

The report, which is official, shows that in the best judgment of the examiners the conditions they describe existed prior to the war. Assuming that they are correct—and their statement is corroborated by that of Dr. Benedick—the claimant was a dependent father when his son enlisted. He was dependent before, since, and is now. The son contributed to his support up to the time of his death, for he had no income from any other source, and the only property he had he sold for $1,000, upon which there was a mortgage of $300.

At the time of his son's enlistment he was fifty-eight years old, was afflicted with inguinal hernia and other disabilities—was disqualified for manual labor. He was dependent, and upon whom if not upon his son, who lived with him and was his sole support? He is now eighty-four years of age, and the pension to which he is plainly entitled, in the opinion of the committee, has been too long withheld.

The accompanying bill is reported for his relief with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GEORGE W. PEAVEY.

Mr. CLARK. I ask consideration of the bill (S. 1478) granting a pension to George W. Peavy, just preceding the one last considered.

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George W. Peavey, late first lieutenant Fifty-seventh United States Colored Volunteer Infantry.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1478) granting a pension to George W. Peavey, have examined the same, and report:

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions on this case, hereto attached and made a part hereof, contains a full statement in detail of the facts in this case. Your committee are led to believe that it is a meritorious case, and would therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of George W. Peavey, have examined the same, and report:

This case is fully explained in the report of the committee made at the last session of Congress, which is as follows:

"The petitioner made application to the Pension Office on April 12, 1884, and his application was rejected; and he now appeals to Congress for the aid to which he thinks he is entitled, and which it is evident he needs. His term of service embraces the time from July, 1861, to October, 1866. He enlisted as a private in Company B, First New York Cavalry, and was discharged June 13, 1865, that he might be promoted to a lieutenancy. At the time of his promotion the colonel of his regiment says:

"'He has served in my regiment nearly four years. He is a meritorious soldier, and I think well worthy of promotion. He is efficient, intelligent, and of good repute.'

"James A. Hudson, an attorney of New York City, says he was an enlisted man in the same regiment with the petitioner; that he knew him during all the time of their service, and has known him ever since; that he has been in the habit of seeing him every week and oftener. In his affidavit he refers to his knowledge of his severe complaining some time after 1870, and of his continued suffering from that time to the present. The petitioner produces the testimony of his attending physicians to show that his disability is great, and that it severely affects his back and one leg.

"The Pension Office rejection is on the ground that he has had no pensionable disability since the date of filing his claim, April 12, 1884. If he had a pensionable disability prior to filing his claim, and contracted it in the service, he would have a claim to a pension during the prevalence of such disability.

"The Adjutant-General's report shows that during the last year of his service he was four times reported sick, and twice on special duty. He believes and claims that his helplessness was caused by sleeping over the steam-pipes on a transportation boat. The record gives no account of the nature of his sickness while in the Army. It never does, and he is unable to procure official testimony as to his condition prior to discharge. He hoped to subsist without a pension, but he became almost helplessly disabled, lost his property, and was compelled to appeal to the Government for what he deemed to be due him. He is now seventy years old.

"His case seems to have merit, but he has had no attorney, and it is not well prepared. In the opinion of the committee, though the evidence is not such as is required by the Pension Office, his illness is due to his service. It is the experience of any careful observer that but very few of those who served in the late war have escaped disabling diseases. This man served about five continuous years. He was very faithful and of good repute. In any case he will not require the aid he asks very long, and it is better to give it to him upon the shadow of a doubt that he has not technically made out a case than to commit the injustice of withholding it if it is his due.

"Your committee report a bill for his relief with a recommendation that it do pass."

It appears from the record reports that this soldier enlisted July 12, 1861, and was discharged October 23, 1865. It is also proven from this source that during the five years of his service he is always reported "present for duty," or "present, sick." James A. Hudson, whose testimony is in part quoted in the previous report, says that he knew him while serving with him in 1861, 1862, 1863, and 1864, and after an interval of two or three years their intimacy was renewed.

"Through all of these years I have known that he claimed and believed that the injuries from which he suffered were received while in the Army and in the line of duty."

The Pension Office called for testimony as to his treatment in hospital during his service. His answer was that he was not treated in hospital at any time, but in his own quarters, being an officer. Then the regimental surgeon's statement was required, which he declares emphatically that he procured and forwarded to the Pension Office. No notice was taken of this, and he says that his repeated requests to be informed as to whether the affidavit of his surgeon has been received or not have not been noticed.

It is true, as stated in the previous report, that his case has not been properly completed. He had no attorney, and depended upon his friends and his own efforts to procure proper testimony. To the committee it is evident that he was sound when he entered the service. It is beyond question that he was accepted as such. His service during the years was uninterrupted and without a cloud. His reputation is vouched for by some of the best citizens of New York. Without an exception he is rated as a temperate, honest, reputable man. He gives as a reason for delaying his application that so long as he was able to support himself he would not become a pensioner; but a change came. The little property which he and his wife had saved is gone; his health entirely failed; age is coming on, and dependence stares him in the face. It may be added, as shown by statements of his neighbors and friends, that he is utterly dependent, and is now supported by those who respect and pity him.

The Commissioner of Pensions states that his claim was rejected "on the ground that there has been no pensionable disability since the filing of his claim." This rejection is based upon the reports of the medical examiners before whom he was ordered.

Physicians who have examined him differ very materially from the doctors appointed by the Government. Dr. Holbrook, of New York, says:

"Mr. Peavey has been carefully examined by me, and I find him suffering from chronic bronchitis and partial paralysis of nerves controlling bladder and sexual organs. As near as I can trace the origin of his troubles, they had their first cause in exposure as a soldier in the war. While thoroughly opposed to granting pensions on slight pretext and without searching investigation, I am strongly inclined to believe Mr. Peavey is entitled to one. At any rate, he is entitled to a most thorough and impartial hearing."

Dr. Thomas W. Ogden, of New York, certifies, "from a sense of duty," as follows:

"I have had an intimate personal acquaintance with Mr. Peavey for a number of years and know him to be an unusually worthy and honest man. I have not the least hesitancy in stating that he has an entirely just claim against the Government, payment of which has doubtless been withheld from the fact that his case has not been properly investigated. I have examined Mr. Peavey's memorial, herewith exhibited, and can vouch for the truthfulness of all statements made concerning his impaired health and pecuniary embarrassment, and it is my candid belief that these conditions are the direct result of the exposure to which he was subjected during the five years of his service as a soldier in the Union Army.

"I know Mr. Peavey's claim to be based upon facts which make the Government his debtor, and hence I earnestly commend him and his case to the confidence and sympathy of all who have the power to aid him in securing recompense for the disabilities entailed through the hard service he rendered the nation at a time when, had he devoted his time and energies to making money, he could, without risk of life or exposure inimical to health, have placed himself in independent circumstances."

The committee are of the opinion that the prayer of the petitioner should be granted, and report the accompanying bill for his relief.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TAULBEE. I ask unanimous consent to take up and consider the bill (S. 2356) which is found on page 82 of the Calendar.

Mr. CHEADLE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. DOCKERY resumed the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

MARY GAMMELL.

The next bill on the Private Calendar, called up for consideration by Mr. SAWYER, was the bill (S. 1298) granting a pension to Mary Gammell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Gammell, widow of Andrew Gammell, late private in Company C, Thirty-fourth Massachusetts Infantry.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1298) granting a pension to Mary Gammell, submit the following report:

The full and convincing facts in this case, as appears in the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, hereto attached and made a part hereof, convince the committee that this is a just case, and they therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

[Senate Report No. 13, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mary Gammell, widow of Andrew Gammell, have examined the same, and report:

Andrew Gammell, the late husband of the petitioner, was a private in Company C, Thirty-fourth Massachusetts Regiment. From the report made by the Adjutant-General to the Commissioner of Pensions, it appears that he was wounded on the 15th of May, 1864, and sent to the hospital at Frederick, Md. This wound is thus described by an examining surgeon:

"A ball passed in near the spine on a level with left shoulder; passed deep under muscles of neck out in front."

For this disability the soldier was pensioned September 2, 1869, from January 21, 1866, at $4 per month. During the subsequent years he applied for increase, and was rejected. He died at Holden, Mass., December 10, 1882, and on the 25th of January, 1886, his widow applied for pension, which was rejected on the ground that the evidence did not connect the death with the wound.

From the affidavit of Dr. I. O. West, of Princeton, Mass., filed with the soldier's application for invalid pension, it is shown that—

"He has suffered a good deal from pain, soreness, and lameness of left shoulder, extending up the neck to a tumor, which was developed immediately after a gunshot wound received during the late civil war. He had a great deal of severe pain in his left side, and on one or two occasions I have treated him for inflammation of lung and pleura of left side."

The affiant says he is disqualified for labor to any extent, and that his disability is the result of his wound. This testimony was given August 13, 1869.

Dr. James G. Shannon, a resident of Rutland, Mass., and late hospital steward, United States Army, testifies in support of the widow's claim as follows:

"That the late Andrew Gammell came under my care in January, 1879, and he continued under my care the greater part of the time until his death, December 10, 1882. He died of consumption, and I always believed that the gunshot wound in the lower part of the neck was the primary cause. During my acquaintance with him he was never able to support his family."

In a subsequent affidavit the same witness says:

"He died of consumption, caused, I believe, by a bullet wound near the apex of, I think, the left lung. A large tumor had formed at that point and extended up the neck."

Dr. Joseph S. Ames, of Holden, Mass., testifies that the disease of which he died was induced by the bullet wound received while in the service. In a subsequent affidavit the same affiant says:

"I have for a long term of years been well acquainted with the late Andrew Gammell, and have at different times prescribed for him; that his death, occurring on the 10th day of December, 1882, was caused by consumption, and that the primary cause of his disease was a gunshot wound in the neck. Of this opinion I am well satisfied."

M. V. B. Jefferson, a resident of Worcester, testifies that—

"He knew Andrew Gammell long before the war; that Gammell worked for him on his farm before he enlisted, and he never knew but what he was a strong and healthy man. After he came home from the war he lived in my house and worked for me until he died, when he was able to work, but there was a good deal of the time when he was not able to do anything. He had a large bunch on the back of his neck, where he was shot, and a bad cough a long time before he died. I think the wound was the cause of his death. He was sick a long time before he died, and he used to complain of the back of his head and neck, and had a good deal of trouble with his lungs about breathing, especially if he had a cold."

The examining surgeon, before whom the soldier was ordered during the pendency of his application for invalid pension, says in his report—

"The disability is permanent. I find a ball hit opposite the seventh cervical vertebra, passed deep under the muscles of the neck, out at the left side of the same, leaving that shoulder and arm weak, lame, and painful."

The board of surgeons at Worcester, who examined the soldier on his application for increase, say in their report:

"A ball passed in near the spine on a level with left shoulder; passed deep under muscles of neck out in front."

The testimony from all sources is positive as to the nature, extent, and severity of the wound. It is shown that his disability was nearly total, and yet he was allowed the meager pension of $4 a month.

All the evidence filed with the widow's application positively and unequivocally connects the death with the wound, nor is there any evidence to the contrary. The examining surgeons say "they find a large tumor above the wound, but having no connection with it." It is not pretended that there was any fatal tendency in the existence of the tumor. It is assumed and proved by physicians of the highest respectability that the soldier died from the effects of the wound, which resulted in pulmonary disease, and this conclusion is perfectly consistent with the facts.

"The ball passed in near the spine and on a level with the left shoulder—passed deep. He died of consumption caused by a bullet wound near the apex of the left lung. He had a cough a long time before he died."

Notwithstanding the positive and consistent evidence of all the affiants, based upon professional knowledge and continuous intimacy with the sick man, and without any proof to the contrary, the conclusion of the medical referee is, "Death resulted from consumption, not gunshot wound."

This assumption is so brief and unsatisfactory that the committee are at a loss to understand why the case is thus disposed of in the face of so much undisputed and positive testimony. If it is intended as a merely technical way of disposing of it, because the doctors affirm that he died of consumption, it is at least apparent that this is not a liberal or even a just decision. The bullet penetrated to near the apex of the left lung; inflammation ensued; there was a gradual decline, waste, and decay—a diminution of the vital powers whose functions had been impaired by the bullet, which penetrated deep, passing in near the spine, on a level with the left shoulder, near the apex of the left lung. There is not a doubt in the mind of the committee that this man died from the wound received in the service.

The accompanying bill for the relief of his widow is reported herewith, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ADVERSE REPORT.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call the attention of the committee to the position of the bill (S. 811) for the relief of Lydia D. Haltz, which passed the committee and the House at last Friday evening's session by mistake, the bill having been reported adversely by the Committee on Invalid Pensions. Having ascertained this fact, the present occupant of the chair stated it in the House on Saturday, and the action of the House on Friday evening was reconsidered. Now, if there be no objection, this Senate bill No. 811, having been reported adversely, will be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

COLUMBUS BOSTEDER.

The next bill on the Private Calendar, called up for consideration by Mr. RYAN, was the bill (H. R. 432) granting a pension to Columbus Bosteder.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls, subject to the limitations of the pension laws, the name of Columbus Bosteder, late a private in Company B, First Regiment of Missouri Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 432) granting a pension to Columbus Bosteder, submit the following report:

In March, 1876, claimant filed an application for pension, alleging that "while engaged in building breastworks at Atlanta, Ga., he strained his back, and suffers from same, which also resulted in varicocele." This application was rejected on the ground of no record and inability to furnish satisfactory evidence.

Claimant enlisted in Russell's regiment of Missouri Engineers, and served from October 31, 1861, until July 22, 1865. The regimental hospital records are not on file at the War Department. The company books show that he was absent, sick, at Nashville hospital February, 1864.

Dr. William A. Neal, the assistant surgeon of the regiment, states that he was well acquainted with the claimant, and that at the time of his enlistment he was in good health and particularly free from varicocele and lameness of the back; that while the claimant was in line of duty on or about October 15, 1864, at Atlanta, Ga., while engaged in lifting sand-bags for the fortifications (according to the claimant's and his comrades' statements, who saw him at work, to the affiant), the claimant contracted a varicocele and strain of the back; that he, as the assistant surgeon, saw the claimant shortly after the injury and treated him for varicocele and strain; that about the 20th of November, 1864, on the march, near Hillsborough, Ga., the claimant reported to him for difficulty in marching, from lameness in back and varicocele, and was by him admitted to ambulance; that the claimant also came to him in Washington, D. C., in June, 1865, in regard to his lameness, when affiant again examined him, finding lameness and varicocele still existing. This was shortly before his discharge.

Capt. Thomas W. Bailey, of his company, testifies to incurrence of the disability from personal knowledge.

Dr. Seth Byram testifies to treatment after discharge, and that claimant could not do half a day's work.

Dr. Ralph B. Crawford testifies to treatment in 1870, and subsequent; says he found claimant suffering from varicocele, hydrocele, and spinal weakness, causing great debility.

Enoch Hunter, a neighbor, testifies to an acquaintance from 1870, and says claimant was suffering from a rupture that prevented his performing manual labor.

The examining surgeon at Ponca, Nebr., says, July 18, 1883:

"I find that left testicle is enlarged to about 3 inches in length and nearly 2 inches in width; is very painful on pressure. * * * Can not walk much on account of the dragging pain suffered."

The medical boards, at two subsequent examinations, describe the disability fully and recommend a three-fourths rating. The claimant in his affidavit, and also in his examination before the special examiner, states that he did not notice any swelling until 1869, though there was a constant soreness and pain in the affected parts. Great stress has been laid upon this statement in the Pension Office, and the presumption was raised that the disability might have been subsequently incurred. On the other hand, it is clearly shown by witnesses, who are reputed worthy of credit, that a disability was incurred at the time, place, and in the manner claimed; that he was treated for same shortly after and twice subsequently in the service; that he is now permanently disabled, and has been for nearly twenty years.

To grant him the benefits of this bill seems to your committee but tardy justice, and they therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CORDELIA R. JONES.

The next business on the private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. SPOONER) was the bill (S. 1300) granting a pension to Cordelia R. Jones.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Cordelia R. Jones, widow of Theodore Jones, a private in Company G, Twenty-eighth Illinois Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1300) granting a pension to Cordelia R. Jones, submit the following report:

The report of the Committee on Pensions of the Senate is a full statement of the case, and is adopted by your committee with a recommendation that the bill pass.

[Senate Report No. 20, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Cordelia R. Jones, praying for a pension, have examined the same, and report:

The claimant's husband, Theodore Jones, enlisted as a private in Company G, Twenty-eighth Illinois Volunteers, March 8, 1865, and was discharged March 8, 1866, by reason of the expiration of the term of his enlistment.

The claim is that he contracted a catarrhal disease in Camp Butler in March, 1865, and died of the effects March 29, 1876. He has no hospital record. Oliver P. Cromwell, first sergeant of his company, deposes that Jones was sick in Camp Butler with a severe cold and complained of his head hurting him from then until Cromwell left the company, about August 1, 1865.

Cromwell was called on by the Department for further information, and made the same statement, adding that Jones went to the doctor quite often.

B. F. Kerrick corroborates the above, adding that Jones was frequently exempt from guard duty on account of disability, and was more or less afflicted during his whole term of service. Called on for information under his own hand, Kerrick informed the Department, August 16, 1886, that Jones contracted catarrh in Camp Butler between the 8th and 31st of March, 1865, by exposure to cold in open barracks, which settled in his head, gathered and broke, and would appear again after taking a slight cold. Was favored by captain by exemption from guard duty. Was affected by his ailment after his return home, and whenever deponent met him afterwards, would say he was all well except the catarrh in the head. He was no shirk, but was a good soldier.

Adam R. Mulholland corroborates this testimony.

Dr. A. T. Tustison deposes, February 16, 1884, that he first knew Jones in August, 1868, and first treated him in December, 1868; again in March, 1869, and thence up to the time of his death, for nasal catarrh. Treated him during his last sickness. Direct cause of death was congestion of the lungs. Jones was disabled by the disease more or less during the time deponent knew him. Called on by the Department for a more circumstantial history, Dr. Tustison writes that it is a recognized fact that in the majority of catarrhal diseases of long standing the lungs become diseased out of sympathy, especially if there be any tubercular or scrofulous taint, which was the case in the Jones family.

Jones had an irritable cough, which gradually grew upon him the last four or five years of his life. In a subsequent affidavit, April 5, 1887, Dr. Tustison testifies that Jones had a chronic catarrh of the head and throat and an irritable cough, which grew upon him.

It appears satisfactorily that claimant can not ascertain the address or whereabouts of either of the surgeons of the regiment, or any of the officers of the company; that the family physician, Dr. Cutler, who treated him after his discharge, is dead, and that deponent Tustison was the second physician who treated him.

This claim was rejected March 26, 1887, in accordance with the opinion of the medical referee "showing that the fatal disease can not be accepted as a result of nasal catarrh." Claimant appealed, but the rejection was affirmed by the Secretary, on the ground that the issue is a "pathological question, which, having been determined adversely by the medical referee, the Department is constrained to adopt the same conclusion."

After a careful consideration of the evidence in this case, your committee are of the opinion that, notwithstanding the technical objections of the Department, the widow of this soldier is entitled to a pension on account of the death of her husband.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

SAMUEL E. WYMAN.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar, called up for consideration (by Mr. SPOONER) was the bill (H. R. 2478) for the relief of Samuel E. Wyman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Samuel E. Wyman, late of Company G, Fifth Regiment Massachusetts Infantry Volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. FRENCH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2478) for the relief of Samuel E. Wyman, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Samuel E. Wyman served in Company G, Fifth Massachusetts Volunteers, from September 10, 1852, to July 2, 1863, when discharged. He again enlisted in the same command July 14, 1864, and served until November 16, 1864, the expiration of his term of service. He applied for pension November 8, 1879, on account of rheumatism, contracted about December, 1862, at New Berne, N. C.

The claim has been rejected upon the ground that there is no record of the alleged disability or evidence of treatment therefor in the service or prior to 1867. This action was had after special examination. The report of the special examiner covers 269 pages, and for the purposes of this report it is deemed sufficient to embody only the summing up of the case by the special examiner, which is as follows:

"The general feeling is that claimant is an honest man, and that he would not ask for a pension unless he believed himself honestly entitled thereto. I am told that he was rather seclusive in the service and not as sociable as a good many others. He is proud, and on account of his deformed condition stays at home and does not show himself as much as he might. It is therefore not at all singular that so many of his comrades have forgotten about him since the war.

"Twenty-four comrades testify that they do not recollect of claimant being lame, or of his complaining about rheumatism or any other disability in the service. Seven comrades testify that they do remember of his being lame and off duty and complaining of rheumatism. I believe the case must be settled by the positive evidence (referring to the several depositions) from comrades, and in depositions (twenty-four in number) as to condition since discharge, and from all the facts in the case I believe the claim to be meritorious."

Medical examination shows back is bent forward so that he looks like a man with a large lump on his back, and the spine is not flexible; right ankle and left knee enlarged and inflamed; is pale and delicate, and has rheumatic iritis of both eyes. Is bent over to such a degree that the abdomen and thorax come so near to each other that the ear of the surgeon can not be placed over the heart. Heart's sounds rapid, feeble, and muffled; slight murmur with second sound. Disability total second grade.

Your committee have carefully examined the evidence in the case, and can not but concur in the opinion of the special examiner, who made such a thorough investigation of the case, that the claim is meritorious, and therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill and ask that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS M'GUIRE.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar called up (by Mr. LONG) was the bill (H. R. 7829) granting a pension to Thomas McGuire.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas McGuire, late of Company I, Ninth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. FRENCH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7829) granting a pension to Thomas McGuire, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Thomas McGuire enlisted in Company I, Ninth Massachusetts Volunteers, August 2, 1862, and was discharged June 21, 1864. He alleges that by reason of exposure during the campaign in the Wilderness he contracted disease of left leg, resulting in varicose veins and partial paralysis. The claim has been rejected by the Pension Bureau because there is no record of the alleged disability, and the evidence, including that obtained by special examination, is not deemed sufficient to connect it with the service.

A careful perusal of the testimony establishes beyond a doubt that claimant was healthy and sound at enlistment; that, as a matter of fact, after the crossing of the Rapidan he became lame from some cause; that his lameness increased, and although able to resume his old occupation (that of puddler's helper) after discharge, was soon compelled to seek lighter labor. Probably within a year after discharge he was treated for this leg trouble for a period of five months at the Massachusetts General Hospital, while the postmaster at Weymouth, Mass., testifies that shortly after his return from service, the exact time not now remembered, soldier did receive town aid because of this disability, affiant then being one of the overseers of the town.

The absence of record evidence, as well as of the testimony of commissioned officers and surgeon, would seem to be satisfactorily accounted for by the fact that the disability was contracted but a short time before the muster-out of the command, and had not at that time become so serious in character as to be easily remembered after a lapse of more than twenty years.

The claimant, as well as all the principal witnesses in the case, are shown by the special examiner to be credible, and, while there is not that mass of evidence in the case usually found in pension claims, your committee are convinced of its sufficiency as to origin in the service.

The disability has continued, and is described by the examining surgeons as partial paralysis and varicose ulcers of left leg. Claimant has not been able to do any work since 1886. He is without resources, and now aided by the town in which he lives.

Believing the claim meritorious, your committee report favorably on the accompanying bill and ask that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. ADELINE COUZINS.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill 2356 in order that it may go over until May 28, to be considered with other bills set for consideration on that day. It is a bill granting a pension of $50 a month to Mrs. Adeline Couzins, and I ask that it go over until May 28, subject to the same conditions as the other bills of like character that are then to come up for consideration.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let the bill be read.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I do not ask that the bill be considered now. I do not wish to delay the business of the evening. I merely ask that the bill go over until the 28th.

Several MEMBERS. Let it be read.

The bill was read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] asks unanimous consent that this bill go over until the 28th instant, subject to the conditions agreed upon as to several other bills of like character which are to be considered on that day. Is there objection?

Mr. CHEADLE. Let us have the report read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman understands that the bill is not called up for consideration now.

Mr. CHEADLE. Yes; but I call for the reading of the report.

Mr. MACDONALD. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CHEADLE. I will withdraw the call for the reading of the report provided it is printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] with that understanding.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I do not understand the effect of the proposition, Mr. Chairman. Is the previous question to be ordered on the bill? I object to that.

Mr. MACDONALD. I call for the regular order. I object to any more time being taken up in this way.

Mr. CANNON. I think the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] can state in three minutes what the report contains.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I am confident that the gentleman will not object. It is a case——

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. For the present objection is made, Mr. Chairman. I do not understand the effect of the proposition.

MARY A. WEST.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. GALLINGER) was the bill (H. R. 7815) granting a pension to Mary A. West.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary A. West, widow of Edward West, late corporal of Company E, First Regiment Heavy Artillery New Hampshire Volunteers, pension claim numbered 321,490.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7815) granting a pension to Mary A. West, having considered the same, report as follows:

Edward West was a corporal in Company E, First Regiment New Hampshire Heavy Artillery, and was pensioned for varicose veins. This disability increased in severity until the soldier became greatly broken in health, the blood being impoverished and the brain suffering as a consequence. Finally he died from an embolism (blood clot) at the base of the brain. Claimant applied for pension, as widow of soldier, but it was rejected on the ground that it was not absolutely certain that death resulted from the disease for which soldier was pensioned.

Laying aside all technicalities, there seems to be no good reason for the rejection of this claim. Soldier was attended at different times during the last years of his life by four reputable physicians, and they severally testify that death was the result of the disease contracted in the Army.

Dr. N. W. Bean, of Chichester, N. H., says:

"It is my opinion, from my knowledge of the case derived from attendance on soldier, that the obstruction to the circulation, caused by the varicosed condition of the leg, was the inciting cause of all the symptoms attending his death."

Dr. B. S. Warren, of Concord, N. H., a medical examiner for the Government during the war, testifies as follows:

"I believe that the disease of the brain was caused by minute embolia, derived from disintegrated clots formed in the dilated sacs of the varicose veins of the lower limbs."

Dr. N. T. Clark, of Loudon, N. H., and Dr. James C. How, of Haverhill, Mass., both testify unqualifiedly to the same facts, the latter physician saying:

"I frequently saw him. He was suffering from large varicose veins of the right leg, with enfeebled action of the heart and dyspeptic trouble. I have no doubt that the disease from which soldier died was caused by and was to be expected from the condition of the veins."

This case was approved for admission, but, as above stated, was rejected by the medical reviewer on the ground that it had not been medically established. Inasmuch as four reputable physicians, who attended the soldier and knew all about his condition, swear positively that he did die from disease contracted in the Army, and for which he was pensioned, your committee regard the claim as one of exceptional merit, and therefore recommend its passage with an amendment striking out all after the word "volunteers," in the eighth line.

The amendment recommended by the committee was adopted.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

EDNA M. HILDRETH.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar called up (by Mr. GROUT) was the bill (H. R. 4103) granting a pension to Edna M. Hildreth.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to put on the pension-roll, at the rate of $25 per month, the name of Edna M. Hildreth, of Jay, Vt., the helpless invalid daughter of William H. Hildreth, who was a member of Company D of the Fourth Regiment Vermont Volunteers, and who died from wounds received in battle.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

Claimant is the helpless invalid daughter of William H. Hildreth, late a private in Company D, Fourth Regiment Vermont Volunteers, who was severely wounded at the battle of Fredericksburgh, and died in Harewood Hospital, in the city of Washington. There is abundant evidence before the committee, medical and otherwise, to show that claimant is utterly unable, in consequence of an incurable disease, which has afflicted her all through life, to do anything for her own support, and that she has no relatives who are able to care for her.

For many years she has been supported by a step-father, but what little property he had was recently destroyed by fire, and now this daughter of a soldier who gave his life for his country must either receive aid from the Government or become a pauper, to be supported at public expense. This case is directly in the line of numerous precedents, several of which have been passed at the present session of Congress, the rate of pension being placed at $18 per month.

Your committee recommend that the bill be amended by substituting the word "eighteen" for the word "twenty-five," in the fourth line, and also by striking out all after the word "Hildreth," in the sixth line, and inserting the words "a private in Company D, Fourth Regiment Vermont Volunteers," and with these amendments recommend its passage.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. ADELINE COUZINS.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen who objected to the order requested by me with reference to Senate bill No. 2356, to provide a pension to Mrs. Adeline Couzins, have consented to withdraw the objection. I renew the request for unanimous consent that this bill go over with the others of the same class until May 28, the previous question being considered as ordered, but the bill to be open to amendment at that time.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I will state that upon the explanation made to me by the gentleman from Missouri I withdraw my objection.

Mr. BYNUM. The only question is whether, if the previous question be ordered, there will be any right to offer amendments when the bill comes up.

The CHAIRMAN. That right will exist, if it be now reserved.

Mr. BYNUM. If that can be done, I have no objection to the previous question being ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this bill will go over till May 28 with the understanding that the previous question is ordered, but that the bill shall be open to amendment. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

ABIAL S. CHAMBERLAIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar called up (by Mr. LONG) was the bill (H. R. 8489) granting a pension to Abial S. Chamberlain.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions of the pension laws, the name of Abial S. Chamberlain, late Company K, First Massachusetts Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. FRENCH) was read, as follows:

Chamberlain was mustered as captain of Company K, First Massachusetts Volunteers, May 24, 1861; promoted to lieutenant-colonel and transferred to the Third Regiment North Carolina Colored Volunteers November 10, 1863. He was mustered out of service June 16, 1865. On June 25, 1862, in battle at Fair Oaks, he was severely wounded in mouth and jaw, for which he is now in receipt of a pension at the rate of $20 per month. He filed an application for increase on account of paralysis resulting from the wound, which application has been denied by the Pension Office, the medical referee holding that the paralysis is not chargeable to the wound.

The certificate of the surgeon, who examined the pensioner at his home on September 29, 1887, he being unable to leave his room, is as follows:

"I find a scar on the right side of lower lip, extending to jaw, also on the end of tongue. The scar on lip about an inch long, not adherent. Another cicatrix about an inch below the angle of lower jaw, which is adherent to the bone, with an indentation in bone about one-quarter inch in depth and one-half inch in width, not tender to pressure. His walk is feeble and staggering. His intellect is dull, appears bewildered when questioned. The power of motion of left arm and leg is greatly impaired, so as to require help in dressing. He has only partial control of his bladder; his urine runs away, keeping his clothing wet. I think the paralysis is due to cerebral lesion, caused probably by injury of branches of the trifacial nerve, lying in the track of the ball. He is, in my opinion, entitled to total rating for the disability caused by wound of mouth and jaw, and for that caused from resulting paralysis first grade, requiring aid of another person."

Dr. A. Elliot, late assistant surgeon One hundred and fourth United States Colored Troops, under date of February 28, 1888, testifies that claimant is unable to be about his room only as he is assisted. He requires the assistance of some one all the time, he not even being able to attend the calls of nature without being assisted.

Claimant's hearing and eye-sight are likewise impaired by the wound.

The effect of a wound upon the nervous system is at times extraordinary in character, as is well illustrated in cases of lockjaw, following often upon the slightest injury. In this case there is a serious wound, which, in the opinion of the examining surgeon, acting under the special instruction of the Pension Bureau, after a thorough examination of the case, affected the branches of the trifacial nerve. If this is true, and your committee have no reason to doubt the correctness of the surgeon's opinion, the connection of the paralysis with the wound seems to be established. At any rate no other cause for this deplorable condition appears in the case.

Therefore, believing that some relief should be granted this great sufferer, your committee return the accompanying bill, with the recommendation that it do pass, amended, however, by inserting therein, after the word "Volunteers," in last line, the following words: "And pay him a pension at the rate of $45 per month, in lieu of the pension now received by him."

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

And pay him a pension at the rate of $45 per month in lieu of the pension now received by him.

Mr. CHEADLE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$45" and inserting "$72." This report shows that the applicant is totally disabled; and the rate under the law for a pensioner totally disabled is $72 per month. It appears from the report that the applicant's wife has been obliged to attend him continuously for the last six months. If in any case ever presented the applicant was entitled to $72 under the law, this is such a case. I trust the amendment will be adopted without division.

Mr. MORRILL. The law allows only $50 in a case of this kind, where the pensioner requires the constant assistance of another person.

Mr. CHEADLE. Then make it $50.

Mr. McMILLIN. I wish to inquire whether the facts which would entitle this applicant under the practice of the Pension Office to a pension of $50 a month are made to appear in the report?

Mr. MORRILL. The Pension Office rejected this claim on the ground that the paralysis was not proved to have been the result of the wound. If that fact had been established to the satisfaction of the office $50 a month would have been allowed. In such cases the rule of the committee has been to fix the rate just below $50—at $45, as in this case.

Mr. CHEADLE. If there is any objection to my amendment, I withdraw it.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. LONG. I move to amend the title and body of the bill by correcting the name, which should be "Abial G. Chamberlain," instead of "Abial S. Chamberlain."

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] will be agreed to.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. SAWYER. Before that is done, I hope the gentleman from Michigan will allow the next bill on the Calendar to be considered. It is one introduced by myself, and I expect to be absent for the next two weeks.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I have no objection. I withdraw my motion for the present.

NETTIE ELLICOTT.

The next business on the Calendar called up (by Mr. SAWYER) was the bill (H. R. 8798) granting a pension to Nettie Ellicott.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll of the United States, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Nettie Ellicott, widow of George E. Ellicott, late a private in the Seventeenth New York Independent Battery.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The beneficiary named in this bill is the widow of George G. Ellicott, who was mustered in the United States service. August 26, 1862, as a private in the Seventeenth New York Independent Battery, and was discharged June 12, 1865. The soldier died May 17, 1884, leaving surviving him the beneficiary, his widow. The solder at the time of his death was receiving a pension for chronic diarrhea, the rate being increased from July, 1881. He had been drawing a pension for this disability from June, 1865. The good character of the soldier fully appears.

The physicians who attended the soldier during his last sickness state in their affidavit that he died from chronic diarrhea and erysipelas. The widow applied for a pension, and the same was rejected on the ground that the erysipelas was not a result of chronic diarrhea and not otherwise traced to the service.

There was no dispute that chronic diarrhea continued down to soldier's death, and pension paid to that time. The evidence as to cause of soldier's death, aside from the evidence of the widow and non-professional witnesses, consists of the report of examining surgeons, the opinion of the examining officer in the Pension Office, and the affidavits of Drs. Munson, Warren, and Chamberlain, physicians living near the soldier, and who knew him and treated him the last years of his life. The personal character and professional standing of these gentlemen is fully indorsed.

The certificate of the surgeon general shows that the soldier was treated in hospital in 1864 and 1865, while in service, for this disease, and the evidence shows the soldier was sick with the same disease at time of his discharge. The reports of the examining surgeons, made in 1878 and 1881, show the continuance and existence of this disease at those periods, and the evidence on file shows that the disease continued down to the time of his death.

Dr. Chamberlain states in his affidavit that he treated the soldier "in the month of November, 1881, for a severe attack of chronic diarrhea, which continued for a week or ten days. The diarrhea was of a very bad, chronic form, and much pus and blood passed with the feces. There prevailed a low general tone and lack of vitality evidenced by palor, flabbiness, lassitude, and general debility.

"I afterwards saw him in each year to his death, observed his condition, and talked with him frequently. I saw his growing weakness and debility, and the advancing effects of his said diarrhea until he finally died in the spring of 1884. From my personal knowledge of his case, I have no doubt that the chronic diarrhea was the primary and leading cause of his death, as it was my opinion when treating him, as above stated, that he could not long survive the said chronic diarrhea."

Dr. Munson states in his affidavit:

"I attended said Ellicott from the 6th day of May, 1884, until the 16th day of May, 1884. That said Ellicott was suffering from chronic diarrhea and erysipelas, the latter developing a phlegmonous character as it proceeded, the former accompanying it through all its stages. That in my opinion said diarrhea was an aggravation of a chronic diarrhea which had existed since said Ellicott left the Army, and that said diarrhea both predisposed him to the erysipelas from which he suffered, and was the prominent factor in the case which precluded a favorable issue."

Dr. Warren, in his affidavit, states:

"On or about the 15th day of May, 1884, I was called in consultation with Dr. Edward Munson to see said Ellicott. I found him suffering from phlegmonous erysipelas of the face and head, which I was informed by the attending physician had commenced as an ordinary form of erysipelas about one week previous. The following symptoms had obtained when I saw him: Pulse 130, temperature 104; low muttering delirium; face swollen and edematous; fetid; skin of face, forehead, and ears puffy, dark, and almost purple, extending to neck, where a natural color prevailed.

"I found in the history of the case that he was a pensioner from chronic diarrhea, and that the diarrhea which prevailed at that time and during his sickness was, in our opinion, an aggravation of his chronic disease. It was consequently my opinion that the low condition of his system, which predisposed him to the erysipelas and prevented him from successfully passing through the attack, was due to and directly consequent upon this same chronic diarrhea."

The same physician, in a subsequent affidavit, says, upon reconsidering his affidavit:

"I wish it to be understood that the primary and active cause of the said soldier's death was chronic diarrhea, which had so vitiated his system and reduced his general vitality as to render him liable to complication of diseases, or the supervening of secondary causes, such as erysipelas or ulcerations in various parts of the body, which might hasten, and in this case undoubtedly did, the final fatal result.

"I should say that the erysipelas which supervened upon the chronic diarrhea in this case was only an incidental contributing cause of death, whereas the chronic diarrhea was the original and primary cause of the sickness and death of the said soldier."

The medical examiners in the Pension Office had the affidavits presented to them, and while the committee would not desire to criticise in the least their action, they feel that the clearly stated opinions of these physicians of high standing in their profession, who personally knew the soldier, examined his case, and saw his condition, and who had better opportunity of forming a correct conclusion, are entitled to acceptance, and they therefore recommend that this bill to place the name of this widow, who is shown to be a worthy and poor woman, upon the pension-roll, do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the Private Calendar, had directed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARY ANN LANG.

On motion of Mr. CHIPMAN, the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7907) granting a pension to Mary Ann Lang.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Mary Ann Lang, widow of Peter Lang, late private Company K, Sixteenth Regiment Michigan Volunteers, on the pension-roll, at the rate prescribed by existing provisions of law.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7907) granting a pension to Mary Ann Lang, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Mary Ann Lang is the widow of Peter Lang, who enlisted in Company K, Sixteenth Regiment Michigan Volunteers, December 21, 1863, and was mustered out July 8, 1865. He died February 21, 1881, of dropsy. At the battle of Mechanicsville, Va., June 1, 1864, he received a wound of nose, on account of which he was a pensioner at time of his death. A week previous to his death he applied for increase of pension on account of rheumatism, but this application was not filed until February 26, 1881.

The widow's claim has been rejected, and the rejection affirmed by the Secretary of the Interior, on the ground that the soldier's death (cause, dropsy) was, in the opinion of the medical referee, due to the excessive use of alcoholic liquors. This decision appears to have been based upon the report of a special examiner. It appears therefrom that soldier, at time of his death and for some years prior thereto, kept a beer saloon in the city of Detroit; but it is not shown, excepting by the testimony of one person, that in the pursuit of this business he drank to excess or that he ever was under the influence of liquor, while on the other hand it is clearly shown that he used beer moderately and at his place of business only.

This witness is one Dr. Hoyt, who attended the soldier at different times probably after 1873, and who treated him in his last illness. He testifies that he first treated soldier for rheumatism affecting arms and legs severely, which, as he then understood, was of long standing. This rheumatism kept up, and he had attacks lasting four or five weeks up to about a year and a half before he died. Then he had a liver trouble, which was of a cirrhosis character, that resulted in dropsy, which caused his death. Thinks there was also heart trouble, but does not think that there was any disease of kidneys. Affiant was unable to connect the rheumatism with the liver trouble and could not give any other reason for it except his (soldier's) long use of beer and liquor.

Dr. Julius Richter testifies to an acquaintance with the soldier since 1867, and that he treated him from that time until 1871 for chronic rheumatism. Again treated him at intervals from 1873 to death. There was no enlargement of the liver, but there was atrophy of the heart. Some three years before death dropsy appeared. Was in attendance upon the soldier three or four hours before his death. Does not believe that soldier's daily drinking had any connection with his fatal disease.

A number of comrades testify, and their testimony is uncontroverted, that soldier did contract rheumatism and suffered therefrom at the time he was wounded, as before stated. Neighbors testify that when home on furlough, after the receipt of the wound, he used liniments for rheumatism of legs. At date of final discharge he is again shown to have suffered from the same disease, and its continuance thereafter is clearly established.

There was no post-mortem examination. The soldier's occupation would seem to have so prejudiced the claim of the widow that no effort whatever was made by the Pension Office to examine the comrades and others who have testified in the case.

It is a well-established medical fact that rheumatism of long duration will produce disease of heart, and that dropsy is a common sequel of the latter disease.

That soldier did contract rheumatism in the service, and that he was a constant sufferer therefrom ever after, is shown beyond a doubt. It is likewise shown that his heart became seriously affected therefrom. Why should the widow now be deprived of a pension because one physician attributes dropsy to the use of beer, when another, who was more intimately acquainted with the soldier and his habits, connects the same with the rheumatism of service?

In the opinion of your committee the widow should have the benefit of the doubt, and therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill, and ask that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

EMILY M'CLURE.

On motion of Mr. BAKER, of New York, the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8884) granting a pension to Emily McClure.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Emily McClure, mother of Thomas J. McClure, late first lieutenant, Company L, Seventh Regiment New York Artillery, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8884) granting a pension to Emily McClure, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to submit the following report:

The beneficiary named in the bill is the mother of Thomas J. McClure, who was killed in the battle of Cold Harbor, June 3, 1864, while serving as first lieutenant of Company L, Seventh Regiment New York Artillery. He left surviving him a widow, but no minor child, who was pensioned and died after remarriage.

Prior to his enlistment as well as during his service the soldier contributed to the support of his widowed mother, who was not, and is not now, possessed of any property affording her an income, but has since the death of her husband in 1857 been dependent upon her own labor and the contributions of others. Of these facts there is ample evidence before the committee. She is now seventy-one years of age and unable longer to gain a subsistence through her own efforts.

The fact that the soldier left surviving him a widow deprives the mother of a pension under the general pension law. But Congress having in many instances granted relief to the poor and aged parents of deceased soldiers who are not otherwise provided for, your committee are of opinion that the relief asked for in this case should likewise be granted, and therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill and ask that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of 10.30 having arrived, the House, pursuant to order, stands adjourned until 11 o'clock a. m. tomorrow.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation, and to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

Mr. BAKER, of Illinois, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that it was understood on both sides of the House that this day should be given to the honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] and the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE]. It was further understood, however, that the gentleman from Maine was not to begin until half past 11 o'clock to-day. In the mean time the Chair will recognize, by request, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BAKER], but will be obliged to limit the recognition to the time specified—that is, until half past 11.

Mr. CANNON. The House can extend the time.

Mr. BAKER, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday, happening for the moment to be out of the Hall, words were spoken by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] reflecting upon my honor, reflecting upon the honor of my constituents, and as taken down by the Official Reporters I ask the Clerk to read them in the hearing of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

On this floor it has been thrown up to us that the gentleman under whom I served in the last Congress had been defeated. That man, clean in life and brave of heart, frank to his foe and loyal to his friends, with a great, boundless love of truth that nothing could impair—they taunt us that his seat is vacant, and that William R. Morrison is the victim of the "combine;" but, gentlemen, much as I miss him—for I have passed the time of life when men ordinarily form new attachments—yet his vacant seat is more clamorous with true eloquence than his presence would be. I tell you, gentlemen protectionists, the virtues of Duncan never cried as loud against the "deep damnation of his taking off," as the vacant seat of Morrison. And the American people are asking whence comes the funds that have debauched the ballot-box and defeated the election of a representative of the people.

Mr. BAKER, of Illinois. Here, sir, is a direct and outrageous attack upon my honor and upon the honor of the district I represent on this floor. In my own name and in the name of the entire Eighteenth Congressional district of Illinois, which he has dared to defame, I hurl the words back to the gentleman from Kentucky and denounce the imputation they convey as grossly untrue. [Applause on the Republican side.] I hurl the words back into the face and teeth of the gentleman from Kentucky with absolute and unmitigated defiance. [Applause.] To use an expressive, though perhaps not very elegant figure of speech, no gentleman from Kentucky shall swing his black-snake whip over my shoulders or the shoulders of my constituents with impunity. He will at least incur the risk of having it wrenched from his hand, and of feeling, mayhap, the butt end of it. [Laughter.]

If there be distinction in the adjective Kentuckian, then I, too, am a Kentuckian. I first saw the light of day hard by the shades of Ashland, the home of that immortal Kentuckian, Henry Clay [applause]—unswerving as Abdiel in his great-hearted patriotism, grand in all his proportions, eloquent as mortal man ever was in pleading the mighty cause of his country, and his whole country, and whose old-time seat of peerless honor and glory in this Hall is now, alas, worse than empty, occupied, as that seat now is, by a gentleman whose speeches are garlands of flowers without leaves or fruit, totally unsuited to affairs, and well adapted to a lady's boudoir, but for their habitual touches of domineering arrogance. [Great applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

That great old-time seat I say is worse than empty—occupied as it is by a gentleman who hisses through his teeth his ill-informed derision of the grand ideas of the grand old statesman whom he succeeds. [Applause.] The colossal shade of that great man hovers over the entire Republic, from ocean to ocean. It walks the Northland and the Southland, and will be a living inspiration in that mighty contest, that impending groundswell which will lift President Cleveland from the White House, and very possibly lift the gentleman of Kentucky from the seat of Henry Clay. [Great applause.]

Be Mowbray's sins so heavy in his bosom,
That they may break his foaming courser's back,
And throw the rider headlong in the lists,
A caitiff recreant.

The words of the gentleman from Kentucky challenge a comparison between his district and mine. The Congressional Directory shows that 30,339 votes were cast for Congressman in my district, whilst in his but 4,791 votes were cast, about one-eighth of the voting population, as I am told, and all voting on one side, whatever the reason of that curious arrangement may have been. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Kentucky represents less than one-sixth of the votes cast that I represent—a feature of minor representation which is spread wide and far through many States affiliating with the gentleman politically. It will be seen that the gentleman from Kentucky does not occupy ground that makes it prudent for him to indulge in reckless and damnatory statements affecting the honor of an election in another State of which he actually knows nothing—even if the law of fair and manly dealing were not sufficient to duly restrain him in such case. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman from Kentucky is as unfortunate in his historical relation to his own great father as is the seat he occupies to its former grand occupant, Henry Clay. Robert J. Breckinridge is a name that belongs to the whole Republic. He was great as a thinker, great as a scholar, great as a writer, great as an orator, and transcendently great as a patriot—a patriot whose intellect, whose heart, whose soul embraced the entire country, instead of a fragment of it. [Applause.] It is narrated of him that, meeting a young man who was about to join the Confederate army in the war for secession and disruption of the Union, he remarked to the youth as follows, using a strong metaphorical expression to convey the intensity of his patriotic feeling:

I understand you are going to join the rebel army. Your father brought you to me in his arms, a struggling infant, and asked that I might baptize and dedicate you to the service of Almighty God; but had I known at that hour that you would have ever betrayed your country and joined the ranks of those who were attempting to destroy it, I could have found it in my heart to have strangled you at the baptismal font.

[Laughter and applause.]

There was a Kentuckian who was a Kentuckian [great applause], and good for something else besides—good for the whole country, with all its mighty interests of civilization and humanity. [Applause.]

The bottom truth about the election in the Eighteenth district of Illinois is that that district was released from the entanglements of one of the most wretched sloughs of political debauchery that could be found anywhere in the United States.

As an illustration of this as bearing upon one important part of the election I will ask the Clerk to read, with clear voice and due accent [laughter and applause], the following purely spontaneous testimonial brought to me by a committee consisting of two Democrats and one Republican shortly after the election.

The Clerk read as follows:

ROOMS OF THE CITIZENS' LEAGUE,
East St. Louis, Ill., November, 1886.

To Hon. JEHU BAKER.

At a meeting of the Citizens' League of the city of East St. Louis, Ill., held this date, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Whereas for several years our city has been misgoverned, its affairs conducted regardless of the people's interests and will, its public funds stolen and squandered, and its people oppressed and terrorized by men elevated to office through chicanery, fraud, and crime; and

Whereas this pernicious and frightful state of affairs was produced and continued by the most shameless frauds perpetrated on the ballot-boxes, whereby tramps, repeaters, and other illegal voters were voted at each election in large numbers, our honest voters intimidated, bulldozed, and assaulted at the polls while attempting to exercise the sacred privilege and right of the franchise; and further, the honest ballots cast were tampered with and changed, or the ballot-boxes stuffed by dishonest election judges and clerks; and

Whereas this atrocious condition of affairs had attained such a firm hold here, the perpetrators thereof being intrenched in office and power, and sustained by our municipal authorities and enforced by our police power, assisted by the evil elements of other sections, that our people had begun to well-nigh despair of ever being able to remove the galling and damnable yoke; and

Whereas every legitimate interest in our city was suffering, real estate depreciating, industrial enterprises fearful of remaining here, merchandising unstable, rents decreasing and uncertain, and business generally flagging and waning and the lives of our people in constant jeopardy; and

Whereas, Hon. JEHU BAKER, by his noble and patriotic espousal of the cause of our down trodden and terrorized people, and his able, vigorous, and unrelenting—which proved a destructive one—onslaught upon the outrageous and atrocious ballot-box frauds which prevailed at elections here and rendered the name of East St. Louis a synonym of shame and disgrace, awakened the slumbering powers of our people and encouraged them to make an exhibition of their vigor and majesty as American freemen; and

Whereas such an exhibition of a pure ballot and an honest count was made by our people at the election here, held on November 2, 1886, at which both triumphantly prevailed, and the cohorts of fraud, dishonest elections, and crime were routed and scattered, and the new election or registration law was adopted by a vote of nearly three to one; and

Whereas the adoption of said new election law insures the dethronement of all the evils aforementioned and the disenthrallment of our people from the rule of fraud, violence, and crime, and the future rule of the people, and good government of our municipality; and

Whereas Hon. JEHU BAKER very materially and patriotically contributed to this great and beneficent achievement: Therefore be it Resolved, By the Citizens' League of East St. Louis, composed of people who have the welfare and true interests of East St. Louis at heart, and irrespective of race, politics, or creed, that the most hearty thanks are due and cordially extended to Hon. JEHU BAKER, as we know the same are as generously felt by every good citizen of our municipality, for the manly, patriotic, Christian and most invaluable services rendered our whole people in their successful battle for the regeneration and redemption of East St. Louis.

Resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon the record of this league and a copy of the same be conveyed to Mr. BAKER by a committee appointed for that purpose and the same be published if not objectionable to Mr. BAKER.

THE CITIZENS' LEAGUE OF EAST ST. LOUIS.
D. C. MARSH, Acting President.
H. C. JACKIESCH, Secretary.

Mr. BAKER, of Illinois. That, sir, was a purely unpartisan testimonial, perfectly spontaneous, and it was a surprise to me when I received it, being waited upon as I said by a committee composed of two Democrats and one Republican, and representing citizens of East St. Louis, irrespective of race, politics, or creed. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Sir, I say truth when I say the change wrought in the city of East St. Louis was similar—only on a much smaller scale—to that which was wrought in the great city of New York when Tweed and his methods were torn up by the roots.

That, sir, was truly honest work, as in my heart of hearts I know it was honest work. Defamation took wing, wretched falsehoods were manufactured and circulated widespread over the United States—shameless falsehoods. I will glance at two of them, giving some idea of the alleged frauds by which my predecessor was defeated. In one case the scene was located at Mount Carmel, in Illinois, far outside of my district [laughter and applause on the Republican side], charging that there were fraudulent tickets, and that voters were purchased at so much a head. Who, outside of Illinois, would know that Mount Carmel was not in my predecessor's Congressional district? Another case. A gentleman performed the ordinary act of drawing out of a bank at Alton $199.50, and the agents or commissioners of two of the Chicago papers spread all over the land the infamous falsehood that the amount was $25,000, and based the report upon a gross perversion of a statement of an honorable Democrat, who, when his attention was drawn to the matter, stated the amount at about $200, and added:

The Democrats of Alton were not purchased and are not purchasable; and our losses in this city ought not to be attributed to the unlawful use of money.

And yet these falsehoods, these atrocious falsehoods, these damnable falsehoods, these corrupting and debasing falsehoods, have continued to float in the putrid air of the lowest stratum of partisan malignity; and the gentleman from Kentucky in effect becomes their sponsor and purveyor, and upon their rotten foundation formulates in this Hall an imputation against the honor of the good people I represent—of all parties. The lightning of Heaven should consume me, God should take my name from out the Book of Life, if I did not rise up in self-contained indignation (for my language is parliamentary, at all events) to repel and crush the imputation! [Applause.]

I proceed, however, to a closer approach to the gentleman from Kentucky. He impugns the integrity of my election. He impugns the character of my constituents, those masses of honest farmers, workingmen, and business men who bore me to this place upon their honest shields as the result of as fair a political victory as ever took place within the limits of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I, whose election is impugned by a solitary voice here, that of the gentleman from Kentucky, and not by a memorial signed by thousands of Kentucky voters [laughter], instantly throw down the gauntlet with ringing defiance at his feet and tell him the imputation is grossly and scandalously false, and challenge—ay, challenge is the word—an investigation. [Great applause on the Republican side.]

Thrice is he arm'd, that hath his quarrel just.

[Applause.]

Lay on, Macduff;
And damn'd be him that first cries, Hold, enough!

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order being called for, the first thing is to have order in the Hall. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I had supposed, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BUCHANAN. I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I judge the gentleman from Maine will be willing to give me five or six minutes, which will come out of the time of the Speaker.

Mr. BAKER, of Illinois. By all means let that be done.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. It is quite significant that the quotation which I made was concerning the act of Macbeth, and the gentleman from Illinois closed his defense by identifying himself with Macbeth in his quotation, "Lay on, Macduff!" etc. It may be a fair and just identification that the gentleman has unconsciously made with that imaginary historical character. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.] I am not surprised at the temper of the venerable gentleman from Illinois, against whom I said nothing. I made no charge on him. He was the mere usufruct of what others did. He got the benefit of what other persons did.

Mr. BUCHANAN. What did they do?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. And I have no doubt from what I have heard of him that he was in the main innocent of what was done; that in the innocency of his simple modesty he thought that the election was due to his merit; that it was his commanding intellect and great popularity that accounted for the defeat of Mr. Morrison. I am sorry that the facts should dispel that pleasing conceit of the venerable gentleman from Illinois. [Cries of "Oh!" "Oh!" from the Republican side.]

I desire to have read by the Clerk, as the foundation of whatever was in the few brief remarks that I made, the letter which I send to the desk, and then I will ask him to follow that with the other letter which I also send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE AMERICAN TINNED PLATE ASSOCIATION,
Room 49, Lewis Block, Pittsburgh, Pa., October 8, 1886.

DEAR SIR: I spent a few days last week at East St. Louis and Belleville, looking into the chances of defeating W. R. Morrison and electing JEHU BAKER for Congress. I was very much encouraged in believing that this can be done. A large number of workmen at the above places who supported Morrison two years ago are now working hard for Mr. BAKER. Morrison is a free-trader, and has been the acknowledged leader of the free-traders for over three years, and as such can not be esteemed as a friend of labor. BAKER defeated him several years ago, and I believe can do so again, as he is a straightforward, honest man, a protectionist, and, though not a rich man, yet one of a large heart and splendid character. His record, also, is irreproachable.

Your name has been given me as a good, reliable man, and one especially fitted to do work among the coal miners in the interest of Mr. BAKER. They tell me that the miners are a large and very influential part of the voters of your Congressional district, hence we need to put in some good work among them. I am informed that Mr. Morrison is popular among the miners, and, if so, then the greater the necessity of work among them. It needs no argument to show that Mr. Morrison is not, at heart, the workingman's friend. It was only last winter that he informed our committee of workingmen at Washington, who were there to plead against his infamous bill to increase the free-list and reduce the tariff, that they must expect wages to continually come to the level of the wages paid in foreign countries. His whole course in Congress has been one of opposition to labor. Miners, no more than iron-workers and glass-workers and other workmen, can not afford to support such a man, as his principles are all wrong. Now, friend Williams, I would be glad to have you go among the miners of the district and help us elect Mr. BAKER. As I am only a workingman, an honorary member of the Amalgamated Association, and an active member of the Knights of Labor, I have not but little funds at my command. I can, however, manage to pay you reasonable compensation for lost time and your expenses. There will be a committee of workmen there in a few days from this section. I will be there myself in about ten days from now. Please let me know at once if you can accept my proposition, and if you do I will forward you a small amount of money to start you out. Hold me responsible for everything in this letter.

Hoping to have a favorable reply, I remain, truly and fraternally, yours,

JOHN JARRETT,
Ex-President Amalgamated Association.

P. S.—Judging from your name, I would think you to be a Welshman or of Welsh extraction. I am of the same nationality, and possibly you are either a Republican or a Greenbacker or a prohibitionist in politics. As such you will find BAKER a good man to support. I do not suppose the Greenbackers have a candidate in the field.

J. J.

By the way, if you know a good man who can assist us in that line, say at Collinsville, you can engage him to assist you on same terms as yourself. I will supply you with the needed funds, all of which will be provided for by our Workingmen's Tariff Club. Answer at once, please.

JARRETT.

Mr. THOMAS WILLIAMS,
Caseyville, Ills.

[In the reading of the above communication some passages were greeted with loud applause from the Republican side of the House and other passages with loud applause from the Democratic side of the House.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I thank you, gentlemen of the other side, for applauding what Mr. Jarrett did. It was what I charged upon you yesterday. I am glad you plead guilty. Will the Clerk now read the other communication?

The Clerk read as follows:

[William J. Lewis, president, Pittsburgh, Pa.; Alfred Marshall, treasurer, Philadelphia, Pa.; John Jarrett, secretary, Pittsburgh, Pa. Executive committee: W. J. Lewis, L. Bacon Foss, Alfred Marshall, W. C. Cronemeyer, B. F. Jones, E. P. Williams, Charles Gilpin, Henry Whiteley, John Jarrett.]

THE AMERICAN TINNED PLATE ASSOCIATION,
Room 49, Lewis Block, Pittsburgh, Pa., October 19, 1886.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: Your favor is just received. I am exceedingly pleased to hear from you, and especially to hear that you are right on this matter. I will be at Belleville on Friday, and would like to meet you there. As I know that it is and has been pretty hard on the miners, I will defray your expenses to Belleville on that day if you come. I desire to have a special talk with you over matters. Also bring a good German representative with you. Hold me responsible for any expenses you may incur. Till then, good-bye.

Yours, truly and fraternally,

JOHN JARRETT.

THOMAS R. WILLIAMS, Caseyville, Ill.

[The reading of the above was also interrupted by applause, occasionally from the Republican and occasionally from the Democratic side of the House].

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Now I ask the Clerk to read this.

The CHAIRMAN. The time yielded by the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. REED. It seems as if the gentleman were taking up more than the five minutes. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. If the gentleman from Maine desires to take the floor away from me I will yield it.

Mr. REED. I see you are going to have read a newspaper extract.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand whether the gentleman from Maine objected to the gentleman from Kentucky proceeding.

Mr. BAKER, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will be allowed to go on.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Maine to yield five minutes of his time?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

The Clerk read the following extract from the Commercial Gazette of Pittsburgh, Pa.:

[Commercial Gazette (Pittsburgh, Pa.), November 4, 1886.]

JOHN JARRETT—HIS REMARKS ON HIS FIGHT AGAINST MORRISON—HE CRITICISES PITTSBURGH MANUFACTURERS AND THE LABOR LEADERS BECAUSE OF NEGLIGENCE—NO HELP FROM THIS CITY TO FIGHT FREE TRADE.

Mr. John Jarrett, who has been conducting a tariff campaign against Morrison and the other free-traders of the West, returned home yesterday and was seen at his residence on Bedford avenue by a Commercial Gazette representative. He said:

"I have just come home from St. Louis. I was campaigning in Congressman Morrison's district, the Eighteenth of Illinois. You know that he was defeated, but I do not claim that it was I who accomplished his defeat. I did all that was possible, but I do not take all the credit to myself."

"Did you go of your own volition?"

"No, sir."

"Then why did you go?" was the next query.

"I went because I was sent," was Mr. Jarrett's reply.

"And who sent you?"

WHO BACKED HIM.

"I went as the representative of the American Tin-Plate Association, to talk to the workingmen of Illinois."

[The reading of the extract was followed by applause from the Democratic side.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I will not take up the time of the gentleman from Maine to have read, but will put in the RECORD another interview with Mr. Jarrett, of November 10, and a letter from Mr. Powell, which shows he received from Pittsburgh $1,550, which was used in that election. The papers referred to are as follows:

[Penny Press, November 10, 1886, Pittsburgh, Pa.]

WHAT IT COST TO KILL MORRISON—JARRETT'S EXPENSES IN THE CAMPAIGN AGAINST THE FREE-TRADER.

"The expenses of my campaign against free-trade Morrison amount to just $747.42," said John Jarrett this morning. "I made three trips to his district, and during the last of the fight had thirteen men in the field. I paid for their time, and also their traveling and hotel expenses. This is all the money that was used."

GENERAL POWELL OUT OF HUMOR—HE DOES NOT SEEM TO BE HAPPY AND SERENE.

BELLEVILLE, November 12, 1886.

DEAR SIR: In your issues of the 10th and 11th instant you have said much more than the facts will warrant, and much more than you or any of your friends can prove when called upon to testify, as you may be, about the means and methods and persons employed in the recent campaign. Had you been as intelligently observant and discerning as were many of your friends of the same political faith in this district, you would not now be so stupidly blind as to the real causes that led to the overwhelming defeat of Mr. Morrison, for I assume that you are not ignorant of the fact that very many Democrats voted with the Republicans for Mr. BAKER, not because they were paid for their votes, but for good and substantial reasons justifying their actions in judgments.

In reference to the undersigned's connection with the recent campaign, he is pleased to say, for the enlightenment of yourself and others who have drawn so heavily upon your vivid imagination as to the amount of money employed to secure the defeat of Mr. Morrison, that his services were of a voluntary character, extending in the main to the Congressional feature of the campaign, because of its national importance, as I believe; and I am impressed with the idea that I have an equal right with you in the enjoyment of my opinions and to work for the cause I espouse. Hence, Mr. BAKER having been selected as the Republican standard-bearer and the champion of protection to American industries and American labor, the only issue in the campaign, I felt it my duty to aid in every honest and honorable effort necessary to secure his election. In pursuance of this purpose, whilst in Pittsburgh in October on other business connected with our works, I made an effort to obtain assistance for meeting the ordinary expenses of the campaign from a few of my friends, which I found hard work, because they, like yourself, regarded the defeat of W. R. Morrison next to an impossibility, because, like yourself, they were ignorant of the actual condition of things in our district.

Hence, I secured all told in and outside of the district the enormous sum of $1,550, an amount that you admit inadequate to cover the legitimate expenses of a Congressional campaign, when considered that there are five counties in this district to divide that amount between. I have no personal knowledge of any other moneys having been brought into this district by any one else, except a sum not exceeding $700 paid Mr. Jarrett and others for actual work, expenses, and time engaged in canvassing in the district for some weeks previous to the election, which Mr. Jarrett and his friends had a right to do without asking your consent. Now, sir, I want to inform you and your disappointed friends that I did not go to Philadelphia nor Chicago. Nor do I believe that you can find a single instance in the entire district where one dollar was spent for beer or votes to secure Mr. BAKER's election by Mr. Jarrett or any one else working in the interest of Mr. BAKER. I know that the entire amounts specified were used strictly in providing for the payment of legitimate expenses, such as you recognize and have enumerated.

Mr. BAKER's canvass was an able and honorable one, rising above the unjustifiable personal abusive methods adopted by his opponents up into the earnest and able discussion of questions of vital importance to every man, woman, and child in our district, made chiefly by himself squarely upon the question of protection to American industries and necessarily American labor, your opinion to the contrary notwithstanding. Mr. Jarrett's visit to the district, to my knowledge, was at the instance of and under control of the workingmen, Democrats and Republicans in the district, independent of the action of iron barons of Pennsylvania and the district or county committees. I repeat that the facts warrant the conclusions that the defeat of Mr. Morrison was effected by and through the able and honorable canvass made by Mr. BAKER, aided by the disaffection in the Democratic party. The prevention of the usual fraudulent voting in East St. Louis by the honest Democrats there, the intelligent and earnest work of Mr. Jarrett, the thoroughly organized efforts secured throughout the district, all combining, influenced the verdict of the voters in the district in favor of Hon. JEHU BAKER.

Yours, in the true interests of American industries, American labor, agriculture, and good, old-fashioned American butter,

W. H. POWELL.

W. J. UNDERWOOD,
Editor News-Democrat.

The foregoing characteristic letter, with its admixtures of weak sarcasm and baronic threats, is published as General Powell's contribution to current political literature in this Congressional district. It neither vindicates him nor his champion nor does it disprove the fact that an attempt was made by Republican managers to defeat Colonel Morrison by corrupt means contributed through outside influence.

As far as the News Democrat is concerned, it knew nothing of the part taken by General Powell in the contest until after the election; and during the campaign we do not remember that he was censured or criticised in any respect for his friendship to Mr. Baker. We knew that he was a partisan in the faith of his party and expected him to use all honorable means to elect his man. After the election, however, in an unguarded moment of jubilation, he could not suppress himself and let the cat out of the bag by saying that he had asked for "assistance" in the East in the interest of his party. This admission, added to the fact of Jarrett's presence in the district and the exposure of his (Jarrett's) methods, was a link in the chain of the damaging evidence that really settled the case.

General Powell says he only received $1,550 "to cover the legitimate expenses of a Congressional campaign." This is the first time we ever heard of the managers of a political party going abroad for money for that purpose. It was certainly an extraordinary precedent, and is well calculated to leave the impression that people abroad desired Colonel Morrison's defeat more than the people at home. As far as we know, the legitimate expenses of local elections are always provided for at home. It is to be presumed that the candidates of the Republican party were assessed by its leaders and managers, as was the custom, and if they did not contribute to their own election it is not probable that people abroad would feel interest enough therein to help them out.

In his letter General P. says that he has "no personal knowledge of any other moneys having been brought into the district by any one else, except a sum not exceeding $700 paid Mr. Jarrett and others for actual work, expenses, and time, etc." It does not follow that because he did not know of "other moneys" that there were none. It is pretty well established that Jarrett obtained money at Alton through one of the banks there, and as he made more than one trip from Pittsburgh, he could have carried on his person several thousand dollars without the knowledge of General Powell.

The truth about the matter is, General Powell's letter establishes, in our opinion, two important facts that sustain the prevailing theories of Colonel Morrison's defeat. Foreign assistance was secured to accomplish the result, and now that this fact is known Republican leaders are worried and out of humor about the matter. Public indignation has reached a degree that causes them alarm, and their energies are taxed to the utmost capacity to divert attention to other than the theories. There may have been other causes tending in a small degree to diminish Colonel Morrison's vote, but these causes were not potential in his defeat.

General Powell further says that to his knowledge Jarrett's presence in the district was "at the instance of and under the control of the workingmen, Democrats and Republicans, in the district." He may be better posted in this respect than we are, but we imagine the number of workingmen engaged in the business was limited to a very small circle—say about a half-dozen who were conspicuous with Jarrett in his manipulation, and who were on his list of friends; and even these workingmen are of the sort that would like to be iron barons—something of the order of the constituents of the now famous Workingmen's Tariff Club, of Pittsburgh.

Therefore it is demonstrated by these statements that there were two different agents who raised money in Pennsylvania, carried it to Mr. Morrison's district, and used it to defeat him. How much more money there was, and how many more agents there were, no one of course knows.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BAKER] either knew of this money raised outside of the district by the agents of the American Tin-Plate Association and other Pennsylvania manufacturers to be used to elect a Representative in the State of Illinois, or he did not. If he knew it, then of course he can not be offended at that fact being known to the American people. If he did not know it, he can not be offended at me for bringing it to his attention to-day. All I said was that that was a mode of debauching the ballot-box that ought to be condemned. To send money raised in another State, and agents from an association which is now seeking to have the duty on tin-plate raised 110 per cent., which duty Mr. Morrison would have voted against, and which duty, it is presumable, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BAKER] would vote for—I said that was not the way to elect representatives of the people. No personal slight to me, no offensive reference to me by the venerable gentleman from Illinois, can obscure that issue before the American people. He and I sink into insignificance in contrast to that issue as to whether the associations and trusts built up by the tariff can send into other States to defeat representatives of the people who will not vote what they desire and elect men who will vote what they demand.

One more reference, sir, and I conclude. The venerable gentleman compliments my father. He does not know, no one into whose family the plowshare of that terrific civil war did not run and divide it can understand, the awful dilemma of a loving son with the irresistible dictates of his conscience on the one side and the unspeakable veneration and love for a father on the other. My father was a Kentuckian who never gave utterance to the miserable and cruel twaddle that the gentleman from Illinois puts into his mouth about throttling that child. He was a manly and generous man who would have looked upon that as both cruel and silly.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I heard him say a great deal worse than that myself in Lexington, Ky., if the gentleman will pardon me.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. And I say to the venerable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BAKER] that I forgive him for hiding behind the grave of a dead father to wound a living son. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BAKER, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, one word. The Kentucky mountain has labored and brought forth a ridiculously small mouse. [Jeers on the Democratic side.] In the letters which he has had read I detect nothing that is of any importance, and as to his statement of the contents of the letter of General Powell, the gentleman is inaccurate. Having seen that letter I am prepared to say that there is not one thing in it against which an impeachmeant can be brought, not one thing, and, as far as I can see, there is not a thing in either of the letters read from Mr. Jarrett which contravenes the election laws of the State of Illinois, and the gentleman from Kentucky, while looking after the purity of the ballot-box, might better be exercised in regard to that considerable region of our country where it is generally understood that immense masses of American votes are suppressed. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the families of the members who can not find places in the galleries, and who are now in the corridors of the House, be admitted to the floor. It is a privilege which has often been granted before.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I shall not object provided gentlemen will observe the rules and refrain from smoking while the ladies are here. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Several members objected.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I purpose to discuss to-day some of the general principles which, in my opinion, underlie the two modes of national action which are confessedly in dispute in Congress and in the country. I shall treat the bill before us as in their hearts the leaders on the other side treat it, as a step only in a particular direction. The whole course of the debate has gone that way, and it is a just and proper way.

How important the propositions at issue are the intense interest already excited by the pending measures on two continents bears the strongest witness that can be borne by men. Those who, living on this side of the ocean, grow and make articles which are necessary for the comfort and happiness of the people of the United States are on one side of the question, while the foreign manufacturers, foreign political economists, and foreign statesmen are all on the other.

This, however, should not prejudice the question. If it be true that by having their goods manufactured abroad the people of the United States as a whole would become richer and more prosperous, would have their houses better furnished, their tables spread with finer linen, and covered with more healthful food; if their bodies would be protected by warmer woolens from the cold of Maine and by finer clothing from the burning sun of Texas; if they would on the whole, and from generation to generation, enjoy more of the comforts and luxuries of life, and would themselves be more intelligent, more independent, and better fitted to be the citizens of a Republic already great and destined to be mighty beyond all former dreams of empire, then by all means let us sink national prejudice, burst the barriers of provincial narrowness, and with one accord adopt not merely the present bill, but such legislation as will surely treble the spindles of Europe and destroy our own—such measures as will put out our furnaces and illumine those beyond the sea.

Let us vote for such laws as will make our mines mere holes in the ground, and stand aside to behold the glory alike of free raw materials and cheap goods purchased in the cheapest markets. Let the tall chimneys no longer disfigure our beautiful skies, and the rushing streams flow to the sea unvexed by mill-wheels, their murmurs undisturbed by the clash of the shuttles and the click of the looms.

If of every two dollars in our pockets, the one alone is sufficient, if spent in England, to give us all we have now, and we are sure of still having in our pockets the same two dollars which we now have, surely the problem is too easy for dispute, too simple for discussion. We have only to pass a bill which gives free course to what the free-trade professors, with glib secularization of the Deity, call the international law of the Almighty; and if the learned economists on the other side are true to their logic, and do not palter with both their language and their convictions, they can propose no other course.

Napoleon was right when he said that Europe must be Cossack or republican; Lincoln was right when he said the United States must be either free or slave. The house divided against itself has to unite or fall. The revenue reform argument is either a false pretense or covers the whole ground. Protection is either in its essence a benefit or a curse. You can not dilute a curse and make it a blessing. Ratsbane and water are no more food than ratsbane pure. [Laughter.] Incidental protection is a sham. Tariff for revenue only goes down before the same arguments which are used against protection.

If protection be a tax for manufacturers' benefit then it is the same tax if it be the result of even a revenue tariff. Incidental protection is of all the most inexcusable. It is an accident which ought to be avoided like a railway disaster. If when you take one dollar from the citizen for the Treasury and four for the manufacturer, is it any the less robbery that you call it a revenue tariff?

If you gentlemen on the other side believe what you say, you ought to be as furious against the rapine and plunder of the Mills bill as you profess to be against those of the present law.

The President is the leader of the Democracy. He is also the dispenser of patronage, and as he is rapidly shaking the dust of civil-service reform off his feet [laughter], he is assuming control over his party. One paragraph in his message covers the whole ground of protection and free trade, and points out the plain duty of the Democracy.

There is but one free trade, and the President is its prophet. Whoever falls in battle in the service of this new Allah and its prophet for him shall open the shining gates of the heaven of foreign missions and Federal offices. [Laughter.] Therefore, with confidence I quote to the true believers the inspired wisdom of the message. It is an old quotation much wondered at. The mere wisdom of this world has refuted it many times and oft. But it is of the essence of the doctrines which oppose protection. It is the warp and woof of the whole discussion, which must be my excuse for again inflicting it on a weary world. "These laws," he says, and he is speaking of tariff laws—"These laws raise the price to consumers of all articles imported and subject to duty by precisely the sum paid for such duties." "Precisely" is the word he uses, and it is a word of tremendous significance. But the corollary which he draws from the whole sentence is of still more tremendous significance. If the consumer pays "precisely" the duty in excess of the price of the imported article, then the President is also right when he says that on all domestic protected articles the consumer pays "nearly or quite the same enhanced price." That is the whole counsel of the Lord on the subject. Whether the protection be incidental or accidental, the result of war tariff or peace tariff, the consumer not only pays the duty on imported articles to the Government, but also on all domestic productions its equivalent to the greedy manufacturer.

At last, then, we have a mathematical basis on which to calculate the damage inflicted on this country by the system established by the men who framed the Constitution. By tariff taxes, whether great or small, whereby manufactures are encouraged, every dollar raised by the Government takes out of the pockets of the people other dollars and puts them into the pockets of capitalists. All these dollars are not merely changed from the pockets of the poor to the pockets of the rich—their value is lost to the nation; for by just so much has the nation's labor been unprofitably expended and wasted.

Since, then, we pay to protected industries the equivalent of the duty which is imposed on imported articles, we have only to calculate the amount of this payment thus lost to the country to find just what we have been doing and just where we are. Our manufactured products in 1880 were $5,370,000,000. If you add less than one-third for increase you will have for the year 1887 the figures given by the report of the Committee on Ways and Means, $7,000,000,000. If you take only one-half of this sum as being under protection, and calculate the duty, you will find that the sum uselessly paid is more than one thousand millions of dollars.

Since 1880 more than six thousand six hundred millions of dollars have been wrested from the people, and six thousand six hundred millions would have bought every acre of farming land in the United States at the outbreak of the war. If you carry back the baleful calculation to the day when we Republicans took charge of the country, you will find, if the President be right, that we have thrown away the whole value of the land we lived in, and instead of turning over to civil-service reform a country worth $44,000,000,000, we turned over a rack-rented farm mortgaged far beyond its value.

There are other remarkable figures to be deduced from that paragraph in the message; figures which must light up the pathway of Democratic duty with the electric light of conscience. [Laughter.] In 1887 forty millions of woolen goods were imported, paying twenty-seven millions of duties, 40 per cent. on cost and duties. This went to the Government. Three hundred and fifty-six millions of domestic woolen manufactures were bought that same year by the impoverished American people. Under the radiant light of the message it will be seen that one hundred and forty-two millions of that money went into the gaping pockets of manufacturers and were lost forever to the down-trodden people. [Laughter and applause.]

We imported thirty-one millions' worth of silks; we manufactured forty-six millions, of which sixteen and one-half millions lined the purses of the plunderers. The same story can be told of every protected industry, until the total of more than one thousand millions of the people's money rolls into the pockets of these licensed robbers of the poor. If this message from our ruler be true, every factory is the abode of a robber baron, more fell and sure than ever swooped down a European hill-side to harry a cavalcade of honest merchants.

In every mine mouth lurks a more dreadful giant than ever before smelled the blood of an Englishman. [Renewed laughter.] But what do the friends of virtue propose to do with these wicked people? Sweep them out of existence with the strong hand of justice? Does the gentleman from Texas intend to lasso these creatures and tangle them in the folds of his lariat? Does the gentleman from Arkansas mean that from their dead bodies the handle of his bowie-knife shall protrude? Ah, no! they are still to live and still to flourish. They will have only the delightful punishment of being turned over to the melting eloquence, the soothing rhetoric of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] while he explains his theory of fair plunder, of honest and decent robbery, with no restrictions save such as will be satisfactory to those good manufacturers who have been admitted to private interviews by the back-stairs. [Laughter and applause.]

The castles of these marauders are still to smoke upon the hill-tops, and the tall chimneys are still to break the sky-line of this unhappy country. They are to be allowed to rob within 7 per cent. of what they rob now, and as compensation they are to be let loose upon the markets of the world, where, according to the learned chairman, they are to reap larger wealth and pile up statelier millions. Do you think that the calculations I have made are but ridiculous imaginings of a scoffer; are but toying with the deep seriousness of the Presidential mind? Nay, not so. The belief that what I have figured out is absolute truth pervades the Democratic mind from one extremity to the other; from the very head to the very tail. [Renewed laughter and applause.]

The Hon. John Randolph Tucker, then a member from Virginia, as delightful in private life as he was able in the service of his country, in the year of our Lord 1882, in a speech delivered May 5, on the twenty-fifth page of the same, made the annual sum thus plundered from the people eight hundred millions for the year 1880. That speech was the most frank and honest grappling with the question I have seen, except perhaps the speech of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL]. In the same year, on the 20th day of April, in a speech delivered that day, on page 6 thereof, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the member from Illinois, proclaimed the astounding fact that during the last nineteen years these ungodly manufacturers had swindled the people out of $15,000,000,000. Let me be exact, for the calculation is specific and precise. The exact sum was $15,063,754,645. [Laughter.] I do not need to cite the learned occupant of the chair [Mr. SPRINGER] or the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], or even that individual who from the Speaker's bench in the gallery overlooked the opening of the debate on the bill which it is insinuated he did not frame. He made it a thousand millions a year six years ago.

Great heavens! These amazing plunderers had in their pockets fifteen thousand millions in 1882; have had eight hundred millions a year since—in all, nineteen thousand eight hundred millions, or three thousand millions more than this whole country is listed for taxation, and the Mills bill, the representative of the concentrated and concatenated wisdom of the Democracy proposes to give them more. [Applause and laughter.] Gentlemen of the other side, heroes of the new crusade for revenue reform and civil-service reform, if you believe what you say, is it not ample time that this tribute cease? What excuse have you for continuing it?

If the President be right, and you don't dare to doubt him, an annual tribute is paid protected manufacturers out of the pockets of the people more impoverishing than ever was exacted by an Oriental despot. In the face of your plain duty to free the people from this iron yoke you stand higgling about the amount of the tribute. Instead of $47 for every hundred you purpose to give $40 of the people's money and throw into the trade the markets of the world!

If it be a tribute, be bold and sweep it away. Why do you hesitate? Is it because you dare not be caught lowering the wages of the laboring men who have votes? Have the courage of your leaders' convictions—for has not the gentleman from Texas, godfather of this bill, who has promised to bring it up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, loudly proclaimed to the open day that tariffs have nothing to do with wages? Is it out of mercy to the capitalist that you falter? [Laughter.]

Do you say there is capital invested under our laws, and we must keep faith with those who have invested it? Whether faith should be kept with such vampires is for you to say. But surely no better faith need be kept than to pay back every cent they have invested. If the President be right, if John Randolph Tucker be right, if the honorable and gallant member be right; if J. S. Moore, who fixes the tribute in 1882 at one thousand millions, more than any of us, be right—if they all be right, then every year more than one thousand millions come out of the people for these men.

What is their whole stock in trade? What is the tale of every dollar they have as capital invested? If you take one-half the industries as protected, and we have made our other calculations on that basis, the whole capital is only one billion eight hundred and sixty million dollars. Now we have shown, according to our chief ruler, that the plunder of these manufacturers is $1,000,000,000. Therefore, in one year and four-fifths of a year, every dollar of that capital could be repaid, provided they kept their mill wheels unturned, and the people of the United States, protected against protection, could be as free and as happy as if the ægis of the Confederate constitution, article 1, section 8, were spread all over the land. [Jeers on the Democratic side.]

Why do men with such beliefs so plain, and so distinct, hesitate to do their duty? It is because every wind that blows, every sight that strikes their eyes, every sound that resounds in their ears, shows the folly of their theories, the absurdity of their logic. What use is it to tell the people of this empire that they have been robbed and plundered one thousand millions of dollars every year, during the very time when over 3,500 miles of distance cities have been springing up like magic, richer in a decade than the old world cities have grown in centuries, when 120,000 miles of railroad have been built, which compress the broad expanse of a continent into a week of time. When the commerce of its inland lakes has grown to rival the commerce between the two worlds; when from every land under the sun the emigrants have been flocking to its happy shores, drawn there by the peace and prosperity which shine on all its borders and sweep from circumference to center. There are no eyes so dull that can not see the ever-rising glories of this Republic except those which are bandaged by the prejudices of long ago. [Applause on Republican side.]

Thus far I have employed a familiar method of argumentation which is called in Latin reductio ad absurdum, or, in plain English, confronting the principles a man lays down with the facts of the universe and showing him the dreadful absurdity of which he has been guilty. [Laughter.] The principles are the President's, the facts are from his own familiar friends. Which do you believe? The two sentences of the message which I have quoted are the essence of free trade. Whoever believes them has but one honest course to pursue. He must demand direct taxation. There is no escape from it. [Applause.]

Now let us turn to the other side. The system we believe in is called protection, and is founded upon the doctrine that a great nation like ours, having all varieties of climate and soil, will be richer, more independent, and more thrifty, and that its people will be better fitted to enjoy the comforts and luxuries of peace, and better situated to endure the calamities of war, if its own people supply its own wants.

I do not purpose to defend protection. Its vast growth within the last quarter of a century defends it better even than eloquent orations. It was born with the Republic. It is the faith and practice of every civilized nation under the sun save one. It has survived the assaults of all the professors of the "dismal science" called political economy. It has stood up against all the half knowledge of learned men who never had sense enough to transmute their learning into wisdom. [Great applause.]

On the face of the earth to-day there are but two sets of people who believe in free trade, whether pure and simple or disguised as revenue reform, and those two are the masked majority of the Committee on Ways and Means and their followers and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with Ireland suppressed.

Russia, the granary of Europe, has abandoned free trade, with the striking result that whereas, in 1876, before the duties were raised, she bought eight million hundred-weight of British metals and paid therefor thirty million of dollars (eight for thirty), she got the same quantity in 1884 and paid only seventeen million for it (eight for seventeen). Three dollars and seventy-five cents per hundred-weight before tariff, and $2.12½ after. Austria, Germany, Italy, Mexico, and the Dominion of Canada, that child of Britain herself, have all joined the army of protection. It is the instinct of humanity against the assumptions of the book men. It is the wisdom of the race against the wisdom of the few.

Perhaps the best argument I can make for protection is to state what it is and the principles on which it is founded.

Man derives his greatest power from his association with other men, his union with his fellows. Whoever considers the human being as a creature alone, by himself, isolated and separated, and tries to comprehend mankind by mathematically adding these atoms together, has utterly failed to comprehend the human race and its tremendous mission.

Sixty millions even of such creatures without association are only so many beasts that perish. But sixty millions of men welded together by national brotherhood, each supporting, sustaining, and buttressing the other, are the sure conquerors of all those mighty powers of nature which alone constitute the wealth of this world. [Applause.] The great blunder of the Herr professor of political economy is that he treats human beings as if every man were so many foot-pounds, such and such a fraction of a horse-power. All the soul of man he leaves out.

Think for a moment of the foundation principles involved in this question, which I now ask, Where does wealth come from? It comes from the power of man to let loose and yet guide those elemental forces the energy of which is infinite. It comes from the power of man to force the earth to give her increase, to hold in the bellying sail the passing breeze, to harness the tumbling waterfall, to dam up the great rivers, to put bits in the teeth of the lightning. Foot-pounds and fractions of a horse-power will never do this. It takes brains and the union of foot-pounds and fractions of a horse-power working harmoniously together.

To grasp the full powers of nature, to reap the richest wealth of the world, we must utilize the full power of man, not merely muscles and brains, but those intangible qualities which we call energy, vigor, ambition, confidence, and courage. Have you never remarked the wonderful difference between a sleepy country village, lying lazily alongside an unused waterfall, where more than half the energy of the people was lost for lack of the kind of work they wanted to do; where, whenever three men met together in the road, the rest looked out of the windows, idly wondering what the riot was about [laughter], and that same village after the banks were lined with workshops and the air was noisy with the whirr of the spindles, and every man was so eager to work that there never seemed hours enough in the day to tear from the powers of nature their imprisoned richness?

If you have, you have also seen the contrast between men left to themselves, so many foot-pounds and fractions of a horse-power, and men incited by hope, spurred on by ambition, and lighted on their way by the confidence of success. [Applause.]

For a nation to get out of itself or out of the earth all the wealth there is in both, it is not necessary for the nation to buy cheap or sell dear. That concerns individuals alone. What concerns the nation is how to utilize all the work there is in men, both of muscle and brain, of body and of soul, in the great enterprise of setting in motion the ever-gratuitous forces of nature.

How shall you get out of the people of a nation their full powers. Right here is precisely the dividing line. The let-alone school say leave individual man to his own devices. The protectionist school say let us stimulate combined and aggregated man to united endeavor. What made men work before governments? Was it an intellectual belief that work was good for the muscles? Not the least in the world. It was hunger and desire. Hunger has ceased to play the greater part, but desire will never pass away.

In the ever-growing desire of mankind for new worlds of comfort and luxury to conquer is the blazing promise of the unhasting, unresting march of civilization. In that column of march the whole nation must be ranged. Association is the instinct of humanity which grows with its growth. First the family, then the tribe, and then the nation. The race will come by and by. Faithfulness to each in their order is the true route to the next.

Here in the United States are 60,000,000 people with all the varied characters their numbers indicate. Some have faculties fit for farming, some for the management of machinery, some for invention. The problem before you is what system will get from all these creatures, so different from each other, the maximum of work and wealth and wisdom. [Applause.]

I have already said that the great incentive, the motive power of man, is desire. That is the magnet which draws him, but, like all other magnets, it must be put near the armature. The quenching of desire must not cost too much. The pathway to its accomplishment must not be too rugged. If you say to him who loves invention and hates farming, your path and your desire lies through the cultivation of the fields, he will say this thing costs too much. If you say to the man who loves the fields, your way must be through the workshop, you bar his progress.

There is only one way to get the best work out of men, and that is to give each the work he can do best. You can only accomplish this by diversifying industry. To diversify industry completely in a country such as ours, there is but one way given under Heaven among men. To enable the American people themselves to supply all their wants, you must give and assure to the American people the American markets. What does this phrase mean in practical life? It means that we, the nation, say to capital, "Embark yourself in the manufacture of such and such articles, and you shall have a market to the extent of the wants of the American people."

Capital then says to labor, "Go with me into this new field, all of you who like this work best, and we will share the results." Then begins a new industry. Multiply this by hundreds and you have a community where every man honestly minded will get what on the whole suits him best, and the nation will get the greatest amount of work from the greatest number.

To this system, so far sketched, no human being can find reasonable objections. But it is averred that there are some drawbacks. It is alleged that the people who are in the older industries—those which establish themselves without law—have to pay higher prices for the articles so manufactured, and that the employment in new industries is all at their expense. This does not in the least touch upon the utilization of human energy and natural energy which would otherwise run to waste. It does not touch upon the question of the divine right of those who are adapted to the older industries to reap alone the riches of the earth.

So seemingly unjust has this last appeared in one instance, that of the land-owner, that a prominent free-trader, Mr. Henry George, who will vote next election for revenue reform, has proposed to take away from land more or less of its value to the owner. That I do not agree to. I make no reclamations on that account.

I meet the question squarely and asseverate that protection does not raise prices. The opposite statement and the argument which backs it up I purpose to state fairly, for we now come to the famous revenue-reform dilemma. You tell us, they say, that protection is for the purpose of enhancing prices to enable high wages to be paid, and yet you say that protection lowers prices. This is flat contradiction. So it is as you state it. But your statement, like all revenue-reform statements, flourishes only by assumption.

In order to make yourself clear, you have utterly omitted the element of time. You assume that we say that both our statements of higher prices for higher wages and lower prices for consumers are for the same instant of time. Not so. When you begin there are higher prices for higher wages, but when you establish your manufactories, at once the universal law of competition begins to work. The manufactories abroad, urged upon by the lower prices which the tariff forces them to offer in order to compete with us, cause every element of economy in manufacture to be set in motion. Every intellect is put to work to devise new machinery which will produce at lower cost, to seek out new methods of utilizing waste, to consolidation of effort to lessen general expenses, and the thousand and one devices every year invented to get more work out of the powers of nature.

At home the same causes are at work, and with redoubled energy, because on account of higher wages there are greater inducements to substitute labor-saving devices for costly labor. And this colossal struggle between two great empires of industry, the foreign and the domestic, results everywhere in the cheapness of commodities, in which progress of cheapness the world has marched on in one unbroken undeviating line, until to-day the citizens of the United States, the sovereigns of to-day, as we call them in moments of patriotic exaltation, the poorest citizens have for the commonest necessities of life the luxuries of the sovereigns of old days. [Applause on the Republican side.]

That lower prices will come at once, we have never said. That they will come and grow lower and lower so that in the series of years which make up a man's life all he needs will cost him less than under revenue reform we asseverate and maintain, and all history is behind our asseverations.

But would not all this take place under free trade; would not English manufactures, supplying all the world, have grown thus cheaper by themselves? Let me answer this question by two others. Do you believe in the lowering of prices by competition? Of course you do. Do you believe that the great production of $7,000,000,000 of manufactures have not entered into competition with those of England? You know that they have been the great power which has forced English prices down.

Do you want an example of to-day? In 1883 the importers were eager to prevent the increase of the tariff on pottery. I know it, because a gentleman was here earnestly urging me not to consent to the increase. Only three years afterwards he acknowledged to me that the foreign manufacturers were obliged, in the face of the great increase of product, both in quantity and quality, to cut their prices so as to pay even more than the tariff tax. Perhaps some revenue reformer may ask me, on the strength of this example, how our raising tariff helped manufacturers here if the foreign manufacturer lowered his prices.

I am glad to answer that question, for it answers many others. Before the raise we were on pottery fighting foreigners gorged with profits and flushed with the spoils of our markets. To-day we are fighting them on even terms, or would have been, but for the package clause. Their profits would be going into our treasury, not into their pockets, and between them and us would still be going on that equal contest for cheaper and cheaper manufactures which, without lowering wages, is giving us every day lower prices and an ever-widening manufacture.

Perhaps some gentleman will say to me that this is all a dream; that the very fact of a barrier raised by our tariff prevents competition. Every manufacturer knows better. England must work or starve. She has piled up her capital, and if she can not get large profits she will take small. Let me not confine myself to theory. Let me once more recall that tremendous fact about Russia. In 1876, three years before her tariff, she bought 8,000,000 hundred-weights of British metals at $30,000,000, 8 for 30. In 1883, four years after the tariff, she bought the same amount, 8,000,000 hundred-weights for $17,000,000, 8 for 17, $3.75 per hundred-weight before, $2.12½ after. Was that the effect of the Russian tariff alone? Not so. It was the effect of tariffs the world over.

Let me show the same fundamental fact on a larger scale. I have here the report of the royal commission to inquire into the causes of the depression of British trade. There is much matter of excellent admission throughout that work, but one paragraph will serve my present purpose. It is on the page numbered xii, where you will find that the exports in 1883 were £240,000,000, but that the value of those same exports at the prices of ten years before were £349,000,000.

The difference is £109,000,000—$545,000,000. If you want it in percentage, you will find that you must add more than 45 per cent. to the price of 1883 to get the richly profitable prices of 1873. To what does the world owe this gain of $545,000,000 in a single year? Who was the fruitful mother of all this gain?

She whom in your short-sighted wisdom you have always called barren, tariff taxes [applause]; and facing your most opprobrious phrase, the one you roll most lovingly under your tongue, I dare to asseverate that if the whole world will repeal its tariff taxes England will reap in the next ten years not only ten times these five hundred and forty-five millions, but a thousand millions more every year. Tariff taxes! How men like to fool themselves with phrases! Because the taxing power is used not only for revenue but as the barrier, and taxes are odious, therefore the barrier must be odious also. How can taxes produce? This is only mere word-trifling. Can you keep cattle out of the cornfield by sticking wood into the ground? Yes, if you make a fence.

Do you mean to tell me, said the wise bumpkin to the engineer on the banks of the Merrimac—do you mean to tell me that you can make that stream useful by putting rocks into it? Yes, said the engineer, as he proceeded to build his dam and set in motion the water-wheels of mighty Lowell.

I have said that the professor of political economy treats man as a soulless aggregation of foot-pounds. Let me give you a striking example of this humanizing science.

Speaking of shorter hours of labor the British commission report, from which I have quoted, says, page XXI, paragraph 82, speaking of shorter hours of labor:

It must be for the country and the workman himself to decide whether the advantages of shorter hours compensate for the increased cost of production or diminished output. We believe that they do, and on social as well as on economical grounds we should regret to see any curtailment of the leisure and freedom which the workman now enjoys. No advantage which could be expected to accrue to the commerce of the country would, in our opinion, compensate for such a change.

On the commission was Bonamy Price, the only recognized professor on it, and here is his sole contribution to this volume:

I beg to express my dissent from paragraph 82. It contains a specified repudiation of the great doctrine of free trade. [Great is Diana of the Ephesians.] Shorter hours of labor do not and can not compensate to a nation for increased cost of production or diminished output. They tax the community with dearer goods in order to confer special advantages on the working man. They protect him, and that is a direct repudiation of free trade. The country is sentenced to dearer and fewer goods.

BONAMY PRICE.

He is right, the dear professor, though rather crisp and brutal. Shorter hours and higher wages are "direct repudiations of free trade." [Laughter and applause.]

Let me now treat you to an argument for protection in America out of Bastiat. Fredrick Bastiat, of France, was the brightest free-trader that ever charged down the lines. No man can refuse the tribute of admiration to the wonderful play of that subtle intellect. He has furnished the other side most of its brains and all its dialectics.

Yet while he is arguing free trade for France, I think he has proved protection for America. Talking to Frenchmen, he says: "I say, and I think so very sincerely, that if two countries find themselves placed in unequal conditions of production, it is that one which is the least favored of nature which has the most to gain by liberty of exchanges."

He proves his case this way. Labor is the sole cost. All the rest is the gratuity of nature. Whatever labor produces in one land more than the same labor in another land is difference of gratuity only. It is the measure of relative richness of the two countries. If one man should discover rich soil he would alone reap the gratuity. If ten thousand men discover it the principle of competition comes in and the gratuity goes to consumers. If one farm could double its fertility, the owner would be richer. If all the farms doubled their fertility, the whole gratuity would go over to the consumers. Let me illustrate that by something which Bastiat never knew, for he died forty years ago.

If one railroad alone in this country had had steel rails, all the benefit of that would have gone to the company. But when all the companies had them, and thereby could do their work cheaper and so save vast amounts of money, some railroad presidents looked for big dividends. What happened? Why each one said I can get a little more business if I do it cheaper, and get the same results. Then they began to compete, and the final result now is that that magnificent gift of nature, through Sir Henry Bessemer, the difference between the strong, long-lived steel rail, and the weak, short-lived iron rail, has, every dollar of it, gone to the people, making cheap transportation instead of big dividends. [Applause.]

Let my poor scared friend who covers his head with the bed-clothes at night lest he should be devoured by monopolies take courage. The Great Maker of this universe knows how to get His gifts distributed to His children. Since, then, the gratuitous part must be distributed, it follows, as Bastiat claims, that exchange is the barter of values, and value being reduced by competition to represent work, exchange is the barter of equal works, and, therefore, in free trade the richest country gives the most; in fact, it levels itself down and levels the other countries up.

Now, which is the richest, Europe or America? We are all agreed on that. We say America because our eyes behold it. You say so because your eyes behold it, and you see one thousand millions wasted besides. What do you mean to do? I will tell you what we mean to do. We mean to keep this wealth here. We mean to do it even if we build a "Chinese" wall of tariff taxes around this country. [Applause.]

Let me give this great truth of Bastiat's another application. Nature produces all. That is the origin of the much-abused phrase, "The farmer pays all." Whenever the farmer goes beyond his farm for the gratification of his desires, Bastiat, the free-trader, shows that he must then share his riches. Now whom shall he share it with, the mechanic at home or the mechanic abroad; his fellow-citizen or an alien? Which is for his interest?

Let me put it in other phrase. Which is it better for a farmer to do, send his surplus wheat a thousand miles to the sea-coast, three thousand miles across the water, pay the freight, sell it to the mechanic who gets less wages, or sell it right here at home to the mechanic who gets more wages? The answer seems obvious.

The minor arguments for free trade are exceedingly simple. Reasoning in a circle always is. There is nothing so compact as begging the question. Truth is difficult. "Easy as lying," is a proverb. Says a learned professor, "If under your tariff I can buy for a bushel of wheat in Liverpool the same articles for which I pay in New York a bushel and a peck, will anybody tell me I don't lose a peck of wheat, and lose it by your tariff?" Looks so, doesn't it? [Laughter.]

But there are two assumptions you perceive on examination; first, that under free trade American wheat will be as high at Liverpool and British wares as low. In other words the learned professor assumes that two bushels of wheat bidding for one set of wares will get them at the same price as when two sets of wares are bidding for one bushel of wheat. Verily this seemeth to be the very thing we are discussing. This was the very point the learned professor started out to prove. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Frank Hurd, the melodious child of free trade, is now traversing this country founding a great oration on the same convincing argument. If a laborer with two dollars in his pocket won in a day in protectionist America can buy in Liverpool for one dollar what he wants, and you make him pay two dollars to the Rhode Island manufacturers don't you cheat him every day out of half his day? Dear, departed friend, first great martyr in this great cause, why not put it the other way? If a poor laboring man in free trade America without a cent in his pocket, and perhaps no pocket in his trousers, should find out that things cost the same in Rhode Island and Liverpool, would the happiness he would undoubtedly feel be anything more than an intellectual delight? [Laughter and applause.]

There are only two fallacies in this foundation stone of the new Jerusalem. The little one is that what costs one dollar in Liverpool will cost two in Rhode Island. This is rhetoric. Let us pass the rhetoric. The big one is that the laborer will get his two dollars under free trade, and goods at Liverpool will be as cheap. This is assumption. I not only point out that all this is assertion and not proof, but I think I can prove the contrary.

You asseverate that if part of the people now there left manufactures and went on the land and produced more wheat we could supply ourselves thereby with the manufactures we failed to make and have a profit, because on our fertile lands we can make wheat cheaper than hardware. Perfectly true, if prices would obligingly keep the same.

What makes wheat so cheap to-day? So many unexpected thousand bushels from India. Would not the same number of extra bushels in America have done the same? Would not so many extra bushels from America added to so many extra bushels from India drive it down at more than double the per cent.? British prices are low because the outside world manufacturing for itself won't buy, and these prices have been forced down, say the board to investigate, etc., 57 per cent. from 1873 to 1885. More wheat from America would lower prices of wheat just as more manufactures under tariff have lowered prices of goods. What a jolly rise those same prices would have if we supplied our lost manufactures by import. [Applause.]

The great folly of this most taking free-trade argument is the reasoning from the individual to the nation. If you should suspend the tariff laws for a single man he could, beyond a doubt, buy in Liverpool for a bushel of wheat what in New York costs a bushel and a peck. But would it not be the same if the laws were suspended as to all? By no manner of means. "Why not," says the free-trader; "is not the nation made up of individuals?" Certainly; but compared with one individual the universe is practically unlimited. He can move round and disturb nothing. Sixty millions of him make a big disturbance when they move.

Let me give you an illustration from Wall street. I suppose that when a distinguished man, an ex-minister to England, which is the least of his distinctions, a man whose perceptions are of such delicacy that the present President reminds him of Abraham Lincoln, of blessed memory, has without reproach compared protection to three-card monte, I may refer to Wall street without censure. [Laughter and applause on Republican side.]

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] who, by the wisdom of the Speaker, so well represents the wishes of his State on the Committee on Ways and Means was once an honored director in the Lake Shore and is now an honored director in the Canadian Pacific. Suppose he were to say to one of his friends—to me, for instance, for I like to dream of such a good thing—you have a hundred shares of Lake Shore. They pay 4 per cent. and sell at 92. Canadian Pacific's sell at 59 and pay 3 per cent. Canadian Pacific is a better road. Interstate-commerce bill favors it and the President is friendly. [Laughter.]

Sell your 100 Lake Shore and buy 156 Canadian. You will get $468 instead of $400 for income and lots of nice chances. I could do that as per programme. My sale of 100 Lake Shore would not depress that stock. My purchase would not raise the Pacific. But suppose 5,000 men tried the same transfer—nay, 500—what would be the result? Canadian Pacific would go up like a rocket and Lake Shore down like a stick, and there would be 500 badly disappointed men, and the more of them there were the more disappointed they would be. If ever the Democratic party, under the lead of the learned professor, on the ground that one man can save a peck of wheat by trading with Liverpool instead of New York, puts this whole nation at the mercy of Liverpool, we shall be a lucky people if we get back the basket.

People say that these tariff discussions are dull and tiresome, but there are always delightful things in them. I don't know when I have bathed my weary soul in such a reverie of bliss as I did while the chairman, by the aid of Edward Atkinson, and the great doctrine of labor-cost, was explaining that the high wages of our work people were not an obstacle, but the very reason itself why the whole circumambient atmosphere should be flooded with the pauper sunshine of Europe. [Laughter.]

The more you pay the workman the less the "labor-cost." The more you give your shoemaker the less the shoes cost. The former, he explained, is the cause of the latter. Less "labor-cost" is produced by higher wages. The higher the wages the lower the labor-cost. No limitation, of course, was set to so divine a principle. The only limit to lowness of "labor-cost" is our generosity to the laboring man. Give infinite dollars to the laboring man and things will cost nothing. [Laughter.] Surely no frantic orator on labor day, the session before election, ever offered to the horny-handed sons of toil such a sweet boon as the great doctrine of "labor-cost."

But softly, my friends. This is not the millenium. It is not the Heavenly Jerusalem newly descended. It is only the old Jerusalem of the Jews, sacred but ancient. It is the old, old fact that the smarter the workman the better the pay, and the manufacturer makes more out of him besides. It is not an absolute fact. It is a relative one. It only means that a better workman in the same country can get better pay than a poor one, and is worth it and a percentage over. It is a valuable fact, but it is an old one, and if Mr. Atkinson, reputed an able man, ever gave such an extension to that idea as his pupil has he must be one of those men who discover a full-fledged planet with moons whenever an asteroid comes within his field of vision.

But the pleasure given by the great doctrine of "labor-cost" is soon lost in the admiration at the cool courage of what follows. Stimulated by the theory of "labor-cost," the chairman ordered an investigation into the oldest manufactories in New England. What was the result? Why, constantly increasing wages and constantly decreasing cost; the two very things his side has sneered at since tariff debates were invented, higher wages for the worker and lower prices for the consumer.

What industries did he select? Cotton sheetings and cotton prints; cotton goods, the very articles, and perhaps the only articles which have had continuous, unbroken, effective protection since 1824. He selects industries which, under all tariffs, have had sixty-four years of solid protection, shows by them higher wages for labor and lower prices for consumers, then boldly wraps the flag of labor-cost about him and proclaims to a wondering world that tariff has nothing to do with wages. I wonder what Edward Atkinson thought of his new disciple at that moment.

Oh, no; tariffs have nothing to do with wrges. It is coal and steam and machinery. But what set up the machinery? What caused the cotton factory to be built? Why, the tariff. So, then, the tariff built the mill, set up the machinery, the machinery increased the wages, but the tariff did not. Is not that very much like saying your father was your progenitor, but your grandfather wasn't. [Laughter.] How could you improve machinery you didn't have? How could you increase the efficiency of machinery that didn't exist?

Perhaps now would be a good time to introduce the Chairman's yard of cassimere. I hate to invite this respectable audience into even this small Sahara of figures; but really there are oases in it. In the original it is one line and a half, specimen of a whole column. Here it is:

"One yard of cassimere, weighing 16 ounces, costs 138 cents; the labor-cost is 29 cents; the tariff is 80 cents." Borrowing from the rest of the column he means, as you will see if you read it, "You pretend, you manufacturers, that you want a tariff for the laborer; and here you are, 29 cents to the laborer, and 80 cents tariff; 51 cents into your infamous pockets."

This is certainly bad. I do not remember ever seeing such a startling exposure of cold-blooded villainy. Why, a robber baron of the middle ages, dead and buried five hundred years ago, with nothing left of him but his coffin, would rise at such a charge and hurl back as indignant contempt as if he had been a Kentucky member charged with refusing hearings on midnight revenue reform. But let us repress our feelings. May be that this news is like the news we used to get from Texas during the war, "Important if true." And it is not true. A yard of cassimere selling at 138 cents, weighing 16 ounces, and paying 80 cents tariff is an impossibility. Just permit me to prove it.

First you take off 27 cents discount for selling. This includes all other incidentals. That leaves 111 cents. Take off 80 cents, the alleged tariff. That leaves 31 cents. That is cost. You see I am liberal. No extras there. Now, if 31 cents is the cost and the goods are invoiced honestly—you see, I am again liberal—what is the duty? It will be largest under the woolen schedule. Therefore we will take that. It can only be 35 cents a pound and 35 per cent. ad valorem. The 35 cents is compensatory for the wool duty paid by the manufacturer. The 35 cents is 35 cents. Add 35 per cent. of 31 cents—10.85 cents—and you have 45.85 cents, which must be your tariff. But 45.85 cents added to 31 cents cost and 27 cents for selling gives only 103.85 cents instead of 138 cents, which shows that the sum doesn't prove.

Now listen to what the rate must be: 138 cents is the agreed price; 27 cents off for selling leaves 111. Now, the fixed specific tariff on a pound of cassimere is 35 cents. Take that out and there remains 76 cents for cost and ad valorem duty at 35 per cent. In other words, 76 cents is 135 per cent. of the cost. Therefore the cost is 56.29 cents, and the ad valorem tariff is 19.71, which, added to the 35 cents specific is 54.71 cents. Adding them all together you have 138 cents. This proves. Now let us see what ratio this bears to the rest of the calculation of the learned chairman. Eighty cents tariff, taking out 29 for labor, gave the heartless manufacturer 51 cents; 54.71 cents will only leave him 25.71.

Can he get away with that? How lucky he would be if he could. Out of that he has got to pay just 35 cents to the woolman, tariff on his wool. In fact, the 35 cents a pound in the tariff is put there for that very purpose. So, according to the chairman's theory, this poor robber baron has got to put his hands into his own pockets and pay 9.29 cents of his own money besides what he gets from tariff. Really any intelligent robber baron would go back to the middle ages, where he certainly had no such luck. [Laughter and applause.]

Of course these figures are of no real earthly value except to prove the absurdity of a line and a half specimen of the chairman's speech. He started out grandly. Go to, he said, I will pay this man's labor and show he pockets 51 cents a yard besides; all out of the tariff. The chairman does not realize that 51 cents a yard profit on cassimere is a colossal preposterousness. He does not have even a suspicion of it.

Between the two kinds of free-trade orators the manufacturers have a poor chance. One of them, like the chairman, proves the inordinate profit of 51 cents a yard, and shouts loudly against the infinite extortion and the piled up wealth. The other, like the member from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL], who seems to have a valuable assortment of unknown facts, proclaims the wide-spread bankruptcy of woolen manufacturers and then wants to know, in an equally loud tone of voice, how we defend such a beggarly business as this. When one insinuates 51 cents profit for every yard and the other testifies to bankruptcy we have between them a millionaire insolvent and a beggar rolling in wealth. [Laughter.]

When the chairman asserts more than 60 per cent. profit on woolens and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] declares that no nation but ours taxes imported wool, while the last publication of the State Department shows at least sixteen, one hardly knows which to admire most, the stupendous imagination of the gentleman from Texas or the rigorous accuracy of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

After all, this exaggerated idea of the profits of manufacturers is at the bottom of the chairman's feelings. Whenever I walk through the streets of that Democratic importing city of New York and look at the brownstone fronts my gorge always rises. I can never understand why the virtue which I know is on the sidewalk is not thus rewarded. I do not feel kindly to the people inside. But when I feel that way I know what the feeling is. It is good, honest, high-minded envy. When some other gentlemen have the same feeling they think it's political economy! [Great laughter.]

Why have I spent so much time on this wretched little yard of cassimere? Simply because it is a sample of a whole column which has been put forward here as the finest result of the free-trade intellect; and there are eighteen more just such palterings with common sense.

Before I leave cassimere let me add one word. One of the chiefest arguments on the stump of the free trader is that our tariff taxes are on the necessities of life. Why shouldn't they be, if protection makes cheaper? The chairman has already shown how cheap cotton is. Let Matthew Arnold tell about woolens. Here I have him in the Nineteenth Century, April, 1888.

> On the other hand, for that immense class of people, the great bulk of the community, * * * things in America are favorable. * * * Society is organized for their benefit. * * * Luxuries are, as I have said, very dear, above all European luxuries, but the working-man's clothing is nearly as cheap as in England, and plain food is, on the whole, cheaper. Even luxuries of a certain kind are within the laboring man's easy reach.

I have thus gone over, well or ill, the real arguments on the other side, all that are really worth touching, but there is in all these rhetorical battles much artillery firing which comes from unshotted guns. They make as much noise as real artillery. They obscure the heavens also with much smoke, and they seem to the careless to contribute to the dead and wounded. Some of these I must ask you to examine, for it is really worth while to see what a part smoke and noise play in this world.

"Monopoly," said Horace Greeley, a doctor of laws, and once a candidate of the Democratic party for the Presidency, "monopoly is, perhaps, the most perverted and misapplied word in our much-abused mother tongue." How very tame this language is. I suppose that during the ten years last past I have listened in this Hall to more idiotic raving, more pestiferous rant on that subject than on all the others put together. And yet I do not regret it. What a beautiful sight it is to see the revenue-reform orator go into action against monopoly. Nelson, as he stood blazing with decorations on the decks of the Victory on the fatal day of Trafalgar; Napoleon at Friedland, as the Guard went cheering and charging by; Thomas Sayers as he stripped for the championship of England when Heenan had crossed the lifting waters; the eagle soaring to his eyrie; the royal man-eating Bengal tiger in his native jungle; nay, the very bull himself, the strong bull of Bashan, as he uplifts his bellow over the rocky deserts of Palestine, are all but pale reminders of one of these majestic creatures. [Laughter.] And yet, outside the Patent Office there are no monopolies in this country, and there never can be. Ah, but what is that I see on the far horizon's edge, with tongue of lambent flame and eye of forked fire, serpent-headed and griffin-clawed? Surely it must be the great new chimera "Trust." Quick, cries every masked member of the Ways and Means. Quick, let us lower the tariff. Let us call in the British. Let them save our devastated homes. Courage, dear brethren. Be not too much disturbed. The Lord will reign even if the board of mayor and aldermen should adjourn.

Call in the British! When the day comes that this Republic can not save itself from a dozen of its own citizens without aid from over the sea, I hope to be buried a thousand leagues under some respectable and permanent mountain range. What unreasonable talk this is. A dozen men fix the prices for sixty million freemen! They can never do it. There is no power on earth that can raise the price of any necessity of life above a just price and keep it there. More than that, if the price is raised and maintained even for a short while, it means ruin for the combination and still lower prices for consumers. That is one of the laws of God working for His children. Compared with one of your laws of Congress, it is a Leviathan to a clam.

Doubtless there are evils in this world to be corrected by law. But let us go at it with sense. The kindly bear who flung a paving stone to drive away a fly which disturbed his sleeping friend killed the man and did not hurt the fly.

But if the revenue-reform orator on the monopoly is terrible, like an army with banners, there is a theme on which he can take up the notes of the dying swan. How we do love to hear him on the impoverished farmer. Then he is not sublime, but he is pathetically great. I heard him first ten years ago. To me, innocent, untraveled, it seemed as if the Western farmer was the most woe-begone, down-trodden, luckless, unsuccessful, dispirited devil on the face of the earth. The Eastern vampire had mortgaged his farm and thrown down his fences, and scattered his substance wantonly to the winds.

In the fullness of time I traveled West myself. You may well imagine my astonishment, who had never seen 10 acres together in corn, to behold fields of that great staple stretching way out to the horizon's edge, to see tracts of land which seemed to have no boundaries but the visible sky; land so rich that if we had an acre of it in Maine we would have sold it by the bushel [laughter], while on every side were the great brick houses, such as only the squire lived in in our villages. After some days of this I became sulky. I said, gentlemen, of course we have robbed you; your Congressmen would not lie about trifles like that. But what disgusts me is that we did not do it more thoroughly. The gleaning looks bigger than the harvest. These crumbs are finer than the food we put on our tables. Then they confided to me that the Western Congressmen were great orators and did this for practice. [Laughter.] Since then I have not been so much moved by it.

Here is another unshotted gun called "the markets of the world." The markets of the world! How broad and cool these words are. They stretch from the frozen regions of the northern pole across the blazing tropics to the ice-bound shores of the Antarctic continent. All this we can have if we will but give up the little handsbreadth called the United States of America. What are these markets of the world?

To hear these rhetoricians declaim, you would imagine the markets of the world a vast vacuum, waiting till now for American goods to break through, rush in, and fill the yearning void. Will your goods go to Austria, to Italy, Germany, Russia, or France? Around all these benighted countries are the "Chinese" walls of tariff taxes. Britain herself is protected by vast capital, accumulated through ages, the spoils of her own and other lands, by a trade system as powerful as it is relentless. All these nations will contest with you the other countries which they already overflow.

Does your mouth water over the prospect? What market do you give up for all this? Where is the best market in the world? Where the people have the most money to spend. Where have the people the most money to spend? Right here in the United States of America after twenty-seven years of protectionist rule. And you are asked to give up such a market for the markets of the world! Why the history of such a transaction was told twenty-four hundred years ago. It is a classic. You will find it in the works of Æsop, the fabulist.

Once there was a dog. He was a nice little dog. Nothing the matter with him except a few foolish free-trade ideas in his head. He was trotting along happy as the day, for he had in his mouth a nice shoulder of succulent mutton. By and by he came to a stream bridged by a plank. He trotted along, and, looking over the side of the plank, he saw the markets of the world [great laughter and applause] and dived for them. A minute after he was crawling up the bank the wettest, the sickest [great laughter], the nastiest, the most muttonless dog that ever swam ashore!

We have now spent twenty days on the discussion of the Mills bill. Have you noticed what has been the most utterly insignificant thing in the discussion? The most utterly insignificant thing in the discussion has been the Mills bill. How do you account for it? I will tell you. If the principles you have enunciated are true, it is an unworthy compromise with Satan. If the principles we have stated are true, it is an unworthy ambuscade, and you know it. You mean this merely for one step. You mean to cut deeper next time. You mean the destruction of the system which now exists.

The whole case can be put succinctly in a few words. If the principles you announce are true, you must have direct taxation. If the dollar you pay the custom-house on the import is followed by a dollar to the manufacturer for every like quantity of domestic goods, which your tariff accidentally encourages, then that manufacture is a misfortune. It takes dollars out of the farmer or lawyer without return. It is no reply, under this Government, to say that the indirect collection of two dollars, one-half of which is lost to the people, is easier because the poor fools don't know it.

That is the old quotation made from Colbert by the gentleman from West Virginia. Surely in this country you do not avow that you are trying to get "the maximum of feathers out of the goose for the minimum of squalling." You don't mean to take feathers out of the American goose and deny him the poor privilege of noise. No, if our proud bird ought to surrender feathers he is plucky enough to surrender like an eagle, and if it is a tax alone he has a right to see just what feathers go.

The forefathers of these Democrats saw this, and, like the honest men they were, clamored for direct taxation. They were right. Why do not you act like them? Why not be bold? Why do you hesitate? It is because twenty-seven years of knowledge divide you from them. In your heart of hearts you suspect your own logic and you dare not. You may well hesitate. Whoever takes down the map of 1860 and the map of 1888 will look upon the most wondrous growth that ever the sun shone on in all its myriad courses around the earth. It is a marvelous spectacle. It is not alone the great cities, born like exhalations, which flash prosperity over the great lakes, over the broad plains, over the mighty fields rich with verdure or teeming with uncounted harvest. It is not alone the piled-up billions under which the great national debt caused by the greatest war expenditure the world ever saw has melted like an iceberg under a tropic sun. It is not alone the rejuvenated South turning its face to its great future. Nay, it is not even all of these combined. It is the fact found by the most cultured Englishman of our day that all this wealth and prosperity has been so shaped that it seeks the comfort—not of the rich, not of the lounging owner of fixed income, not of the pampered minion of governmental power, but of the plain people whom Abraham Lincoln loved, and who are of right the chief glory of this Republic. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky (when Mr. REED'S hour was about to expire) said: Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him just a moment? His hour is within a minute of expiring, and I ask unanimous consent that his time and that of my colleague [Mr. CARLISLE], who is to follow him, be extended without limit.

There being no objection, the extension requested was granted.

Mr. REED resumed and concluded his remarks.

Mr. CARLISLE (the Speaker). Mr. Chairman, I am very much obliged to the committee for its courtesy in granting me an unlimited extension of time, but I shall endeavor to confine my remarks within the usual limits, even if compelled to omit some matters which it had been my purpose to discuss.

I shall not attempt to follow the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] in all the arguments he has made, or in all the illustrations he has submitted to the committee; for, in fact, I was unable to hear a large part of what the gentleman said.

The gentleman started out with the proposition that the supporters of the pending bill are either inconsistent or insincere, or perhaps both; because, he says, if protection is wrong, a tariff for revenue is also wrong; that there is no difference in principle between them, the difference being only in degree.

Therefore the gentleman's argument is that the supporters of this bill should advocate absolute free trade. I might retort upon the gentleman by saying that if the doctrine of protection is correct, then that doctrine should be carried by its friends to its logical and legitimate results—absolute prohibition of foreign imports. But the gentleman from Maine has made this unnecessary, because he has announced that such is his purpose, and the purpose of his political associates, if necessary, and that they will preserve in this country all of its own trade and wealth, even if compelled to erect a Chinese wall around it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Sir, China preserved all the trade and wealth of her own people within her own limits for thousands of years, but I do not think that the advocates of diversified industries or the friends of labor can find much to encourage them in the social and industrial condition of that country to-day. [Renewed applause on the Democratic side.] There the doctrine of protection, pure and simple, was carried to its logical results, and it produced its inevitable effects. With the oldest civilization in the world, with every variety of soil and climate and natural resources, with a frugal and industrious people, with a literature abounding in philosophical and speculative thought, the useful arts and manufactures are still in their infancy, and labor is still the abject slave of capital. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

No, sir; we do not want another China here, nor do we want or expect absolute free trade. [Renewed applause on the Democratic side.] We all recognize the fact, which I suppose even the gentleman from Maine will concede, that the Government must have a revenue for its support, and that this revenue must be raised by taxation in some form or other. I presume the gentleman from Maine will also concede that all taxation is an evil which it would be well to avoid, if possible, but that, as it cannot be avoided entirely, we are simply reduced to a choice between that system which would confine the trade of our own people, in a large measure at least, to our own limits without increasing the revenues of the Government and the more liberal system which will make trade and commerce as free as possible consistently with the raising of sufficient revenue for the support of the Government. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If our manufacturing or mining industries, or any other industries in the country, receive a benefit by the imposition of duties upon imported goods under this system, they are entitled to it and they are welcome to it. [Renewed applause.] It is impossible to impose taxes under any system that can be devised without hurting somebody or helping somebody; and for my part—and I think this is the sentiment of my political associates on this floor—I would rather help them than hurt them. [Renewed applause on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine, in all his long discourse, lasting nearly two hours, made no reference whatever to the actual situation which now confronts us—a situation which makes it the imperative duty of the Representatives of the people to reduce the revenues before this Congress shall adjourn. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It appears from the last official statement that there was in the Treasury at the close of the last month, including subsidiary and minor coins, the sum of $136,143,357.95 over and above all the current liabilities of the Government. This was $56,676,662.65 more than the surplus on hand on the 1st day of December, 1887, and shows that there has been since that date an average monthly increase of $11,335,332.15. The surplus accumulation each month under the existing system of taxation is more than the total cost of the Government during the first two years of Washington's administration, while the aggregate sum is considerably in excess of the whole expenditure of the Government during the first eighteen years of its existence under the Constitution, including civil and miscellaneous expenses, war, navy, Indians, pensions, and interest on the public debt.

Every dollar of this enormous sum has been taken by law from the productive industries and commercial pursuits of the people at a time when it was sorely needed for the successful prosecution of their business, and under circumstances which afford no excuse whatever for the exaction. [Applause on Democratic side.] There is not a monarchical government in the world, however absolute its form or however arbitrary its power, that would dare to extort such a tribute from its subjects in excess of the proper requirements of the public service [renewed applause]; and the question which Congress is now compelled to determine is whether such a policy can be longer continued here in this country, where the people are supposed to govern in their own right and in their own interest.

During the progress of this debate more than one gentleman on the other side has referred to the enormous surplus now in the Treasury as a matter of but little consequence; and in fact there are some who appear to regard it as a blessing, rather than a misfortune, that we should have more than $130,000,000 of the people's money withdrawn from the channels of trade and securely locked up in the vaults of the Government. Sir, I can imagine no financial condition more dangerous to the integrity of legislation and the prosperity of the country than that which results from the existence of a large surplus in the public Treasury. Even if it were possible for such a surplus as we now have to accumulate without the imposition of any tax or burden upon the people, it would still be, in my opinion, a very great misfortune, because the inevitable effect would be to encourage useless and extravagant appropriations in violation of those principles of public economy which are absolutely essential for the preservation of a popular government with constitutional limitations upon its powers. [Applause.]

If there be any serious danger now threatening our institutions, it is the growing disposition among those who represent particular classes and special interests to disregard the checks and break down the barriers of the Constitution in a promiscuous scramble for a division of the public treasure. Fortunately there is in no part of the country any feeling of opposition to the proper exercise of public authority, either State or Federal. On the contrary, the prevailing tendency is toward the enlargement and extension of governmental power by construction, especially in matters involving the appropriation and expenditure of money.

When the Government has collected, or is collecting, more money than it needs the people, realizing the injustice of a policy which unnecessarily deprives them of a part of their earnings, are almost sure to demand its return in some form or other. If the Government may rightfully exercise the power of taxation for other than public purposes, it is difficult to convince those who pay the money that it can not also rightfully exercise the power of appropriation for other than public purposes. It is safe to say, therefore, that so long as this policy shall be continued, not only will largesses and bounties for the promotion of purely private interests be demanded, but new fields for the exercise of legislative power and new objects for the appropriation of the public money will be discovered.

But it is said that we still have outstanding a large public debt, and that no great injury can result to the country if the present rates of taxation shall be continued and the surplus revenue used in the purchase of bonds. I agree, Mr. Chairman, that so long as we have a surplus its application to the extinguishment of the public debt is the very best use that can be made of it. [Applause.] But I totally dissent from the proposition that it would be wise or just to raise a surplus revenue by taxation merely for the purpose of purchasing at a premium the unmatured bonds of the Government, except so far as may be necessary to meet the requirements of the sinking-fund law; and I am not satisfied that it would not be good policy, if the revenue could be properly reduced, to suspend the operation of that law, in whole or in part, for a reasonable time. It is not possible to defend, and it would be ruinous to perpetuate, a fiscal policy which compels the people to pay to the public creditors twenty-five cents on the dollar more than the obligations of the Government call for; and yet that is just what we are doing and just what we must continue to do unless the revenue is reduced by the passage of this or some other bill.

On the 17th day of last month the Secretary of the Treasury, in pursuance of authority conferred upon him by the law of March, 1881, as interpreted by the two Houses of Congress, issued a circular inviting proposals for the sale of bonds to the Government. The first purchase was made under this invitation on the 18th day of April, and between that date and the close of business yesterday, a period of one month, he has purchased on account of the Government 4 per cent. bonds to the amount of $13,456,500, upon which interest had accrued at the date of the purchase to the amount of $53,172.07. For these bonds he was compelled to pay the sum of $17,046,136.06, which was $3,536,464 more than the principal and accrued interest, or a premium of 26⅓ per cent. During the same time and under the same authority he purchased 4½ per cent. bonds to the amount of $12,404,450, upon which interest had accrued to the amount of $108,086.55. For these bonds he paid the sum of $13.379,188.37, which was $866,652.37 in excess of the principal and interest. The premium paid upon this class of bonds was nearly 7 per cent.

This is the situation into which the Government has been forced by the failure of Congress in past years to make provision for a reduction of taxation. Millions of dollars which ought to have remained in the hands of the people who earned the money by their labor and by their skill in the prosecution of business have been taken away from them by law to be paid out to the bondholders in excess of their legal demands against the Government. [Applause.] And, sir, if the present Congress shall adjourn without applying a remedy, this unjust process must go on for an indefinite length of time. In the presence of such a situation we can not afford to quarrel about trivial details. A reduction of the revenue—not by increasing taxation, as some propose, but by diminishing taxation in such manner as will afford the largest measure of relief to the people and their industries—should be the great and controlling object to which everything else should be subordinated. [Applause.] I do not mean that every interest, however small and insignificant, should not be carefully considered in a friendly spirit, but I do mean that the general interests of the many should not be subordinated to the special interests of the few. [Applause.]

Although the question now presented is purely a practical one, it necessarily involves, to some extent, a discussion of the conflicting theories of taxation which have divided the people of this country ever since the organization of the Government. There is a fundamental and irreconcilable difference of opinion between those who believe that the power of taxation should be used for public purposes only, and that the burdens of taxation should be equally distributed among all the people according to their ability to bear them, and those who believe that it is the right and duty of the Government to promote certain private enterprises and increase the profits of those engaged in them by the imposition of higher rates than are necessary to raise revenue for the proper administration of public affairs; and so long as this difference exists, or at least so long as the policy of the Government is not permanently settled and acquiesced in, these conflicting opinions will continue to embarrass the representatives of the people in their efforts either to increase or reduce taxation.

While no man in public life would venture to advocate excessive taxation merely for the purpose of raising excessive revenue, many will advocate it, or at least excuse it, when the rates are so adjusted or the objects of taxation are so selected as to secure advantages, or supposed advantages, to some parts of the country or to some classes of industries over other parts and other classes; and this, Mr. Chairman, is the sole cause of the difficulties we are now encountering in our efforts to relieve the people and reduce the surplus. It is the sole cause of the unfortunate delay that has already occurred in the revision of our revenue laws, and if the pending bill shall be defeated and disaster in any form shall come upon the country by reason of overtaxation and an accumulation of money in the Treasury, this unjust feature in our present system will be responsible for it. [Applause.]

Whenever an attempt is made to emancipate labor from the servitude which an unequal system of taxation imposes upon it, whenever it is proposed to secure as far as possible to each individual citizen the full fruits of his own earnings, subject only to the actual necessities of the Government, and whenever a measure is presented for the removal of unnecessary restrictions from domestic industries and international commerce, so as to permit freer production and freer exchanges, the alarm is sounded and all the cohorts of monopoly are assembled to hear their heralds proclaim the immediate and irretrievable ruin of the country. [Applause.]

We have been told over and over again during this debate that the passage of the pending bill will destroy many valuable industries now flourishing in various parts of the country; that it will deprive thousands of laborers of employment and greatly reduce the wages of those who continue to work; and the gentleman from Maine, who has just spoken, has substantially repeated the gloomy predictions to which the House has listened so often during the last three weeks. Sir, if I believed that the passage of this measure would injure a single honest industry, or reduce the wages of those who are employed in it, I would, notwithstanding the great emergency which now confronts us, hesitate long before giving it my support. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But in my opinion the reductions now proposed on dutiable imports, and the proposed additions to the free-list will be beneficial to the manufacturers themselves as well as to their laborers and the consumers of their products. As the Representatives from New England on the other side of the House appear to be especially alarmed concerning the injurious effects of this bill upon the great manufacturing industries in their part of the country, it may not be inappropriate to call their attention to a few historical facts connected with our tariff legislation in the past and the effects of low rates of duty upon the prosperity of their people. The highest rate of duty imposed by the tariff act of 1846 upon any class of woolen goods, cotton fabrics, manufactures of leather and of hardware, was 30 per cent. ad valorem, and upon most kinds of cotton goods it was only 25 per cent. These were the industries in which New England was most largely engaged, and her Representatives here, except those from the State of Maine, who were divided upon the question, protested against the passage of that act, as they now protest against the passage of the pending bill, upon the ground that it would paralyze and ruin these great interests. The Representatives from Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Hampshire, and Vermont voted unanimously against the bill, with the exception of Mr. Collamer, of Vermont, who did not vote at all. But it passed nevertheless, and became a law; and now, Mr. Chairman, let us see what its effect was upon the most important industries of these great manufacturing States, and what the subsequent action of their Representatives was after an experience of eleven years under these moderate rates of duty.

We have no authentic statistics showing the progress made by manufacturing industries between 1846 and 1857 as a separate and distinct period of time, but it may be fairly assumed that the full force and effect of the new rates of duty were realized at least as early as the census year 1849, and we have the census returns of 1850 and 1860, the latter based upon the productions of the year 1859, to which I beg leave to invite the attention of gentlemen from New England and other gentlemen who believe that low tariffs destroy manufactures and pauperize labor. During the period mentioned the value of all our woolen manufactures increased more than 42 per cent.; the number of hands employed increased 18½ per cent., but the total amount of wages paid increased nearly 37 per cent. [applause], showing that the percentage of increase in the amount of wages paid was twice as great as the percentage of increase in the number of hands employed. [Applause.] Taking all the New England States together the increase in the value of the product in this industry was 62 per cent. The increase in Massachusetts was 54 per cent.; in Rhode Island, 176 per cent.; in Vermont, 61½ per cent., and in Maine, 83½ per cent. In the manufacture of hosiery the progress during the ten years under consideration was almost marvelous. In the Eastern States the increase in the value of the product was 481 per cent. It was 523 per cent. in Connecticut, 377 per cent. in New Hampshire, and 373 per cent. in Massachusetts.

What was the effect upon the manufacture of cotton fabrics in New England and in the whole country? Why, sir, the value of the production in the United States increased 77 per cent., the number of hands employed increased 28½ per cent., and the total amount of wages paid increased 39 per cent. [Applause.] In New England the increase in the value of the product was over 81 per cent., in the number of hands employed 28 per cent., and in the amount of wages paid 36 per cent. Massachusetts increased her product 77 per cent., New Hampshire 55 per cent., Rhode Island over 87 per cent., Connecticut 116 per cent., Maine 137 per cent., and Vermont 27½ per cent.

In the six New England States the increase in the value of the product in the manufacture of boots and shoes was 83 per cent.; in Massachusetts the increase was 92 per cent., in Connecticut 10 per cent., in Maine 99 per cent., and in Rhode Island 337 per cent. The production in New England alone in 1860 was greater than the aggregate production of all the States of the Union in 1850. In the manufacture of hard ware New England increased the value of her product 100 per cent., and in this industry also her product in 1860 was greater than the product of all the States in 1850.

Instead of paralyzing the industries and pauperizing labor in New England, or any other part of the country for that matter, the tariff act of 1846 infused new life and vigor into our languishing manufactures and secured more constant employment and higher wages to our laboring people; and the consequence was that even the strong prejudices of New England were removed by actual experience, and in 1857 every Representative from that part of the country who voted at all voted for a bill making an almost uniform reduction of 20 per cent. from the rates imposed by the act of 1846 and placing many additional articles upon the free-list.

Here is the vote upon the tariff act of 1857, as it first passed the House, a Republican House over which Nathaniel P. Banks, of Massachusetts, presided as Speaker. Five of the six Representatives from Maine voted for it, and the other one, who was absent when the vote was taken, had made a speech in favor of its passage. Nine of the ten Representatives from Massachusetts voted in the affirmative, and the other was in the chair and did not vote. Every Representative from New Hampshire, Vermont, Connecticut, and Rhode Island was present and voted for the bill, and among them appears the name of the venerable and distinguished Senator who still serves his State at the other end of the Capitol, Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL.

The bill to which I have referred was sent to the Senate, where it was amended by making a very slight increase in the reduction of certain articles, and, finally, upon agreeing to the conference, eighteen Representatives from New England voted in the affirmative and nine in the negative. Two-thirds of the men chosen by the people of New England to represent their interests in Congress declared by this vote that a further reduction would be beneficial to their industries, and thus the tariff act of 1857, which we have so often heard denounced on the other side of the House, became the law of the land by the votes of Republican and New England Representatives.

These Representatives of the greatest manufacturing section of the country had seen their industries grow and prosper as they had never grown and prospered before; they had seen capital realizing adequate returns upon its investment; they had seen the number of laborers employed constantly increasing and the rates of wages continually rising, and they had seen at the same time the agricultural and commercial interests of the people in all parts of the country flourishing to an extent which the wildest enthusiast had scarcely dreamed of before. All these things they had seen, Mr. Chairman; but there are other things with which we have grown perfectly familiar in these times of high-tariff and class legislation which they did not see. They did not see great monopolies and trusts created to limit the supply and control the price of the necessaries of life. [Great applause.] They did not see enormous fortunes accumulated in a few years by corporations and individuals engaged in favored industries, while the great mass of the people were struggling hard to live comfortably and pay their taxes; nor did they see at any time during that period, as we have seen, thousands of honest laborers parading the streets of our cities clamoring for work, or assembling around our mines and factories with hired police to watch them. [Applause.]

This was the experience of the Representatives from the New England States during the eleven years from 1846 to 1857, under a low tariff; and is it any wonder, Mr. Chairman, that they came here and by a unanimous vote a still further reduction in the interest of the manufacturers demanded? [Applause.] And if this bill shall pass and become a law, I predict that within less than eleven years from this time the gentlemen who now represent New England on this floor and oppose this bill will be here voting for a further reduction, or the people will send somebody here who will so vote. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, if time would permit I would like to submit some of the opinions delivered by the leading representatives of our manufacturing interests during the debate upon the tariff act of 1857, and even at the risk of dwelling too long upon this subject I will venture to read a few short extracts from the speech of Henry Wilson, of Massachusetts, afterwards Vice-President of the United States, a gentleman who perhaps understood as thoroughly as any one the real condition and necessities of his constituents. Among other things he said:

> The manufacturers, Mr. Chairman, make no war upon the wool-growers. They assume that the reduction of the duty on wool, or repeal of the duty altogether, will infuse vigor into that drooping interest, stimulate home production, and diminish the importation of foreign woolen manufactures, and afford a steady and increasing demand for American wool. They believe this policy will be more beneficial to the wool-growers, to the agricultural interests, than the present policy. The manufacturers of woolen fabrics, many of them men of large experience and extensive knowledge, entertain these views, and they are sustained in these opinions by the experience of the great manufacturing nations of the Old World.
> Since the reductions of duties on raw materials in England, since wool was admitted free, her woolen manufactures have so increased, so prospered, that the production of native wool has increased more than 100 per cent. The experience of England, France, and Belgium demonstrates the wisdom of that policy which makes the raw material duty free. Let us profit by their example.

When this speech was delivered wool had been admitted free of duty in England for a period of less than thirteen years, and yet the testimony of this distinguished New England Senator was that it had already doubled the product of native wool in that country. In the same speech he said further:

> If our manufactures are to increase, to keep pace with the population and the growing wants of our people; if we are to have the control of the markets of our own country; if we are to meet with and compete with the manufacturers of England and other nations of western Europe in the markets of the world, we must have our raw materials admitted duty free or at a mere nominal rate.
> We of New England believe that wool, especially the cheap wools, manila, hemp, flax, raw silk, lead, tin, brass, hides, linseed, and many other articles used in our manufactories can be admitted duty free, or for a mere nominal duty, without injuring to any extent any considerable interest of the country.

Further on he said:

> In closing, Mr. Chairman, the remarks I have felt it my duty to submit to the Senate and the country, that the Commonwealth I represent on this floor—I say in part, for my colleague, Mr. Sumner, after an enforced absence of more than nine months, is here to-night to give his vote if he can raise his voice for the interest of his State—has a deep interest in the modification of the tariff of 1846 by this Congress. Her merchants, manufacturers, mechanics, and business men in all departments of a varied industry want action now before the Thirty-fourth Congress passes away.
> They are for the reduction of the revenue to the actual wants of an economical administration of the Government; for the depletion of the Treasury, now full with millions of hoarded gold; for a free-list embracing articles of prime necessity we do not produce; for mere nominal duties on articles which make up a large portion of our domestic industry, and for such an adjustment of the duties on the productions of other nations that come in direct competition with the product of American capital, labor, and skill as shall impose the least burdens on that capital, labor, and skill.

In the same debate Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, said:

> On Sheffield hardware, such as cutlery, edged tools, files, and saws, some protection is needed a little longer, but for this 20 per cent. is ample, and upon all other kinds 10 per cent., I feel quite sure, is fully sufficient.

The present duty on cutlery is 50 per cent., just two and a half times the amount which Mr. MORRILL said was fully sufficient more than thirty-one years ago. On files the duty now runs from 52 to 65 per cent., an average of three times the rate specified by Mr. MORRILL; and on hardware it is now three times what he thought was necessary.

Mr. Chairman, it is customary in all our debates on the tariff for gentlemen on the other side to depict in the darkest colors the condition of the country during the financial depression of 1857. That depression, from which the country recovered in a few months, was an insignificant incident in our history in comparison with the great industrial, commercial, and financial storm which began here in 1873 and devastated the country for five years [applause], closing mills and factories, extinguishing the fires in our furnaces, ruining banking and mercantile houses, and throwing hundreds of thousands of laboring people out of employment. Under a low tariff our industries soon revived and the country started again, like an awakened giant, on its march to wealth and power [applause], but under a high tariff it struggled on for five weary years, and, for the first time in its history, was brought face to face with those difficult and dangerous social problems which still confront us, and which it will require all the wisdom and patriotism of her ablest and best citizens to solve.

It has been repeatedly charged here and elsewhere that the credit of the Government was so reduced by the act of 1857 that it was compelled to sell its bonds at a discount of 12 per cent. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], speaking of the effects of the acts of 1846 and 1857, said:

> But this brief period of prosperity was quickly followed by the revenue tariff of 1846 and 1847, which brought to the country another era of industrial depression, culminating in the bankruptcy of 1857, the disastrous consequences of which are still within the memory of living men. Universal bankruptcy confronted the people, and the Government, with an empty Treasury, was forced in a time of peace to borrow money at a discount of from 12 to 30 per cent.

I hold in my hand a volume issued from the Treasury Department in 1881, while Mr. Windom was Secretary, giving the history of all the loans negotiated by the Government from the time of its organization to the date of the publication; and this account, taken from the official records, shows that from the time of the passage of the tariff act of 1846 down to the last ten days of Mr. Buchanan's administration, when civil war was imminent, not a bond or Treasury note or Government obligation in any form was sold at less than par, while many of them having but a short time to run and bearing but 5 per cent. interest were sold at a very considerable premium in gold. [Applause.] After the passage of the Morrill tariff bill, in March, 1861, and after the Democratic administration had gone out and a Republican administration had come in, twenty-year bonds, bearing 6 per cent. interest, were sold at 15 per cent. discount. [Applause.] But does the gentleman think it would be fair to charge this to the high tariff of 1861? Does the gentleman think that it would be fair for me to say that these bonds were sold at a discount because the rates of duty on imported goods had been increased by the act of March 2, 1861? Sir, I would be ashamed of myself if I should make such a charge. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The truth is that the credit of the Government was always good until the breaking out of the civil war, or at least until it became evident that there was to be a great civil commotion in this country. But, Mr. Chairman, I have already devoted too much time to this part of the subject. My only excuse for it is that there has been so much misunderstanding or misrepresentation concerning the history of what the gentlemen on the other side call the "free-trade" period that it seemed necessary to make some allusion to it.

Mr. Chairman, during the last fiscal year the average rate of duty upon dutiable imports was about $48 upon each $100 worth of goods, and the revenue collected from that source was more than $212,000,000. During the same time the Government collected about $119,000,000 under the internal-revenue laws, nearly all of which came from the taxes on distilled spirits, fermented liquors, and manufactured tobacco. In the fiscal year 1866, which was the first entire fiscal year after the close of the war, the receipts from internal-revenue taxes amounted to nearly $311,000,000, while the receipts from customs, or tariff taxes, amounted to $179,000,000, and the rate upon dutiable goods was $40.19 upon each $100 worth.

This brief statement shows that while the receipts from customs have largely increased, the receipts under the internal-revenue laws have been greatly diminished, and that the taxes imposed by those laws are now collected from a few articles of luxury, or of taste, the use of which could be almost, if not entirely, dispensed with without injury to the people. There are many who believe, in view of the large reductions heretofore made in the internal-revenue taxes, and in view of the fact that they are not now imposed upon articles of necessity, that the whole reduction now so much needed and so urgently demanded by the country should be accomplished by the revision of the tariff laws; but the framers of the pending bill, recognizing and respecting the differences of opinion which exist upon this question, have proposed to deal with both systems of taxation. They propose to make a reduction of $78,000,000 based upon the receipts of the fiscal year 1887. About $54,000,000 of this is proposed to be taken from the tariff taxes and about $24,000,000 from the internal-revenue receipts by the repeal of the tax on tobacco and the abolition of certain special taxes upon dealers and others.

So far the opposition to the bill has been directed mainly against that part of it which proposes to repeal or reduce the tax upon certain classes of imported goods; and gentlemen, speaking for the interests which have long ago been relieved of all the burdens imposed upon their industries, earnestly protest that the consumers of their products shall have no relief, or at least that they shall not have the full measure of relief contemplated by this bill. In 1866 there was collected from the incomes of those having net annual receipts exceeding $600 the sum of $72,982,159, and from manufacturers and their products, excluding distilled spirits, fermented liquors, and tobacco, the sum of $127,230,609. Every vestige of this enormous burden upon our manufacturing industries has been removed, and properly removed, but the high rates of duty imposed on imported goods, to compensate for this domestic taxation, have not been removed. It was a very great mistake, to say the least, that they were not both removed at the same time, for after having afforded relief to one side it seems almost impossible to secure relief for the other. There never was a time while these heavy internal taxes remained upon their products that the manufacturers would not have been glad to surrender a large part of the tariff duties in order to secure a removal of the charges upon their industries. In 1867 Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, who was doubtless familiar with the views of those engaged in manufacturing industries, said in a speech in the Senate:

> Every law imposing a duty on imported goods is necessarily a restraint on trade. It imposes a burden upon the purchase and sale of imported goods and tends to prevent their importation. The expression "a free-trade tariff" involves an absurdity.

Again he says:

> Every duty on imported merchandise gives to the domestic manufacturer an advantage equal to the duty.

[Applause.]

How will gentlemen reconcile this statement with the contention on that side that the consumer does not pay the increased price?

> Every duty on imported merchandise gives to the domestic manufacturer an advantage equal to the duty, and to that extent every tariff is a protective tariff.

[Applause.]

Again he said on the particular point I am discussing:

> If you converse with intelligent men engaged in the business of manufacturing they will tell you that they are willing to compete with England, France, Germany, and all the countries of Europe at the old rates of duty. If you reduce their products to a specie basis, and put them upon the same footing they were on before the war, the present rates of duty would be too high. It would not be necessary for scarce any branch of industry to be protected to the extent of your present tariff law. They do not ask protection against the pauper labor of Europe, but they ask protection against the creation of your own laws.

[Applause.]

He referred to the internal-revenue laws and the paper currency. All the internal-revenue laws of which the manufacturers then complained have been long since abolished. The business of the country is now, and has been for many years, conducted upon a specie basis, and I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the great body of consumers in this country, the men and women who toil in the unprotected industries, have a right now to demand that their claims for relief shall be considered in any measure that may be passed for the reduction of the revenue. [Applause.]

In a speech delivered in the Senate in 1872 upon this same general subject, Mr. SHERMAN repeated substantially the same views, but I will not detain the committee by reading it.

A MEMBER. I would like to hear it.

Mr. CARLISLE. It is good reading.

A MEMBER. It will help him at Chicago.

Mr. CARLISLE. If he will stand by the doctrines and policy he announced then it ought to help him to secure the Republican nomination at Chicago. He said, in a speech delivered on the 15th of March, 1872:

> It must be remembered that the present duties, taken together, are far in excess of what they were before the war, and that they have been three times largely increased since the passage of the Morrill tariff act of 1861.
> The result of such duties is to secure to mechanical industries higher wages than can be earned in other kindred employments. Such excessive protection not only ceases to diversify production, but forces labor into protected employments. If the present rates of duty were high enough during and since the war, when home industry was burdened with heavy internal taxes—with stamp duties, income taxes, and high rates on raw materials—then surely they are now too high when all these taxes are removed. * * * I have listened with patience, day by day, to the statements of gentlemen who are interested in our domestic productions. I am a firm believer in the general idea of protecting their industries, but I assure them, as I assure their representatives here, that if the present high rates of duty, unexampled in our country, and higher by nearly 50 per cent. than they were in 1861, are maintained on metallic and textile fabrics after we have repealed the very internal taxes which gave rise to them, and after we have substantially given them their raw materials free of duties, we shall have a feeling of dissatisfaction among other interests in the country that will overthrow the whole system, and do greater harm than can possibly be done by a moderate reduction of the present rates of duty. And I am quite sure that intelligent men engaged in the production of various forms of textile and metallic fabrics feel as I do, that it is wiser and better to do what is just and right, to make a reduction on their products, at least to the extent of the reduction in this bill on their raw materials, rather than to invite a controversy in which I believe they will be in the wrong.

[Applause.]

And he also said this, to which I desire to call the particular attention of my friends on the other side of the House, those who disagree with me upon the principles which ought to govern taxation in this country:

> The public mind is not yet prepared to apply the key to a genuine revenue reform. A few years of further experience will convince the whole body of our people that a system of national taxes, which rests the whole burden of taxation on consumption, and not one cent on property or income, is intrinsically unjust. While the expenses of the National Government are largely caused by the protection of property, it is but right to require property to contribute to their payment. It will not do to say that each person consumes in proportion to his means. This is not true. Every one must see that the consumption of the rich does not bear the same relation to the consumption of the poor as the income of the one does to the wages of the other. As wealth accumulates this injustice in the fundamental basis of our system will be felt and forced upon the attention of Congress.

I do not know any place where this principle has been more clearly stated than it is here stated by the Senator from Ohio. But I must pass on to other matters.

It seems that our friends on the other side have at last concluded that there ought to be a reduction of the revenue, and many gentlemen who have spoken in opposition to the pending bill have foreshadowed their policy. Its main feature, in fact about its only feature as regards the tariff, is the total repeal of the duty on sugar and the payment of a bounty to the producers of that article; not to the laborer who tills the soil and converts the cane juice into sugar, but to the capitalist who owns the plantation and the refinery. After all their professions of love for the laboring man, after all their arguments to show that labor receives the benefit of the tariff, after all their harrowing descriptions of the deplorable condition to which our laboring classes would be reduced if the tariff were removed, when they come to put their propositions in the form of practical legislation the mask falls off and the natural features of the system are exposed.

But, sir, let us see what would be the effect of the repeal of the duty on sugar—the effect upon the revenue and upon the people who are compelled to pay taxes in some form for the support of the Government.

The latest reports I have at hand showing the total amount of sugar produced in this country and the total amount consumed are for the year 1886, and they show that the domestic production was 302,754,486 pounds, while the total consumption was 3,111,640,000 pounds. It thus appears that considerably less than one-tenth of the domestic consumption is produced at home, and that the remainder is imported and pays duty at the custom-house. The duty collected during the last fiscal year was $57,000,000. Now, assuming that the whole amount of the duty is added to the price of the domestic article, it is clear that whenever $1 is taken out of the pocket of the consumer on account of this increased price more than $10 are paid into the public Treasury for the support of the Government and the discharge of its obligations.

The repeal of this duty, therefore, while it would undoubtedly reduce the revenue, would afford very little relief to the people in comparison with the relief that would be afforded by the repeal of duties upon many other articles in common use. For instance, the duty collected last year upon woolen goods, cotton goods, and iron and steel was $62,000,000; but this was a very small proportion of the burden actually imposed upon the consumers of these articles. According to the last report of the American Iron and Steel Association, which has just been issued, there were produced in this country during the year 1887, 2,354,130 gross tons of Bessemer-steel rails. The duty upon this article is $17 per ton. Applying the same rule to this article which I have applied to sugar, and which gentlemen on the other side also apply to sugar, that is, that the whole amount of the duty is added to the price of the domestic product, it is easy to see that the increased cost of steel rails alone to the people of this country in 1887 was over $40,000,000, although the Government received only about $1,000,000 revenue from this source.

The proposition to pay a bounty of 2 cents per pound out of the Treasury to the sugar-grower is a confession of all that has been charged against the present system of tariff taxation. It is a confession that the tariff tax is a bounty to the manufacturers or other producers of the domestic article of the same character as the imported article, and it is a confession that the amount of the duty on the foreign product is added to the price of the domestic one; for if these charges be not true there is no semblance of justice or propriety in the proposition to pay a bounty of 2 cents per pound as a compensation for the repeal of the duty.

Sir, I am just as much opposed to the raising of a fund by taxation for the purpose of paying a bounty to the sugar-growers of Louisiana as I would be if it were to be paid to the cotton-growers of Georgia or the wheat-growers of Minnesota. It is a vicious and demoralizing policy, and can never become permanent in this country. If gentlemen desire to extend relief to the producers of sugar, and at the same time help all the other people of the country, let them propose to reduce or repeal the taxes upon the iron and steel implements used in the cultivation of the soil; upon the machinery employed in the preparation of their crops for the market; upon the materials used in the construction of their buildings, and upon the clothing which they and their families and laborers are compelled to wear. This would be a general and not a partial measure of relief, and would be creditable to a great political party which seeks to govern the whole country. The people who are interested in the production of sugar can neither be bribed nor deceived by the offer of a bounty, for they know that their fellow-citizens engaged in other pursuits will not consent to be taxed for any great length of time for any such purpose.

Mr. Chairman, it has been stubbornly contended all through this debate that high rates of duty upon imported goods are beneficial to the great body of consumers, because such duties, instead of increasing the price of the domestic articles of the same kind, actually reduce the prices. If this be true, all the other arguments in support of the existing system are not only superfluous, but manifestly unsound. The proposition that a high tariff enables the producer to pay higher wages for his labor, and the proposition that it also reduces the prices of the articles he has to sell, which are the products of that labor, are utterly inconsistent with each other, and no ingenuity of the casuist can possibly reconcile them. [Great applause.] Labor is paid out of its own product, and unless that product can be sold for a price which will enable the employer to realize a reasonable profit and pay the established rates of wages, the business must cease or the rates of wages must be reduced. When the price of the finished product is reduced by reason of the increased efficiency of labor, or by reason of the reduced cost of the raw material, the employer may continue to pay the same or even a higher rate of wages and still make his usual profits. But the tariff neither increases the efficiency of labor nor reduces the cost of the raw material.

I do not deny that prices have greatly fallen during the last fifty years, not only in this country, but all over the civilized world—in free-trade countries as well as in protectionist countries. Nor do I deny that during the same time the general tendency has been towards an increase in the rates of wages; and this is true also of all civilized countries, free-trade and protection alike. It is not possible for me now to enumerate, much less discuss, all the causes that have contributed to these results. One of the most efficient causes, in fact the most efficient cause, is the combination of skilled labor with machinery in the production of commodities. The introduction and use of improved machinery has wrought a complete revolution in nearly all our manufacturing industries, and in many cases has enabled one man to do the work which it required one hundred men to do before. Here is a statement furnished by the United States Commissioner of Labor to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, showing the value of the product of a week's labor in spinning cotton yarn by hand and the value of the product of a week's labor combined with machinery in the same industry. In 1813, one man working sixty hours by hand could turn out 3 pounds of cotton yarn, worth $2.25, or 75 cents per pound; now the same man, if he were living, could turn out in sixty hours with the use of machinery 3,000 pounds of cotton yarn of the same character, worth $450 [applause], or 15 cents per pound. The cotton-spinner now receives as wages for his week's work more than three times as much as the total value of the product of a week's work, including the value of the material, in 1813; and yet labor is far cheaper to the employer now than it was then. Although the employer now receives only one-fifth as much per pound for his cotton yarn as he did in 1813 he realizes from the sale of the products of a week's labor just two hundred times as much as he did then.

I have also a statement prepared by the same official, showing the relative production and value of product of a weaver using hand and power machinery, from which it appears that a weaver by hand turned out in seventy-two hours in 1813 45 yards of cotton goods (shirtings), worth $17.91, while a weaver now, using machinery, turns out in sixty hours 1,440 yards, worth $108. Substantially the same exhibit could be made in regard to a very large number of our manufacturing industries.

Is it strange, Mr. Chairman, in view of these facts, that the prices of manufactured goods have fallen or that the wages of the laborers who produce them have risen? Is it not, on the contrary, remarkable that there has not been a greater fall in prices and a greater increase in wages? Undoubtedly there would have been a greater reduction in prices and a greater increase in wages if there had been a wider market for the products and a lower cost for the material.

The tremendous productive forces at work all over the world in these modern times, and the small cost of manual labor in comparison with the value of the products of these combined forces, can not be realized from any general statement upon the subject. In order to form some idea of the magnitude of these natural and mechanical forces, and the efficiency of manual labor and skill when connected with them, let us look at the situation in six of our own manufacturing industries. In the manufacture of cotton goods, woolen goods, iron, and steel, sawed lumber, paper, and in our flouring and grist mills, there were employed, according to the latest statistics, 517,299 persons, not all men, but many of them women and children. This labor was supplemented by steam and water power equal to 2,496,299 horse-power. This is equal to the power of 14,977,794 men; and thus we find that a little over 517,000 persons of all ages and sexes are performing, in connection with steam and water power, the work of 15,495,093 adult and healthy men.

The railroad, the steam-vessel, the telegraph, the improved facilities for the conduct of financial transactions, and many other conveniences introduced into our modern systems of production and distribution and exchange have all contributed their share towards the reduction of prices, and it would be interesting to inquire what their influence has been, but I cannot pursue this particular subject further without occupying too much time.

Gentlemen are in the habit of referring to the great decline in the price of steel rails in this country as conclusive evidence of the fact that the tariff reduces the cost of manufactured products to the consumer. Why, sir, they could not, in my opinion, have selected a more unfortunate illustration. In the first place, the price of steel rails has fallen all over the world and especially in England, where they are and always have been admitted free of duty. The price there is now and has at all times been very much lower than here. In the second place the price was falling rapidly both here and in England before the imposition of the duty of $28 per ton by act of Congress in 1870. During the five years next preceding the imposition of that duty the price in England had fallen steadily, year by year, and had declined from $85.65 per ton to $50.37 per ton; and in the United States the same process had been going on, and the price had fallen from $148.50 per ton in gold in 1864, to $91.17 in 1870. Then the increased duty was imposed and what was the result? The price immediately began to rise, both here and in England, so that in 1873 the average price in England was $80.05 per ton and the average price here was $103.91 per ton in gold. Then came, in the fall of that year, the great industrial and financial depression which arrested the growth and development of the country, suspended the construction of works of internal improvement, paralyzed our industries, and brought down the prices of nearly everything that the people produced. Steel rails, of course, like all other manufactured products, felt the influence of this depression, and the price declined and has never since been as high as it was before.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are told that a tariff is beneficial to the farmer because, first, it protects him against competition from the agricultural products of other countries, and, secondly, because by diversifying our industries and increasing the number of person engaged in other than agricultural pursuits, it furnishes him with a profitable home market for his products. It can not be necessary for me to make an argument to show that no rate of duty, however high, upon articles which the farmer is compelled to send abroad and sell at foreign prices, can possibly benefit him here at home or elsewhere. This has been so often shown, and is so thoroughly understood by the farmers themselves, that it would be a waste of time to dwell upon the subject.

It is barely possible that at particular points along or near our Canadian border there are times when the small duty on barley, potatoes, hay, and a few other articles prevents competition from the other side of the line, but if the gentleman from Maine is correct in his contention that the tariff does not increase the price of the domestic product, of course this is of no advantage whatever to the American farmer. In fact, according to the gentleman's argument, if the tariff has any effect at all upon the interest of the farmer in the cases I have mentioned, it reduces the prices of his product, and is therefore an injury to him.

But I do not agree with the gentleman, and I concede that the producer of these articles at the places indicated may occasionally receive higher prices for them than he would receive if there were no duty; but while they receive this occasional benefit—which is a very slight one even when they enjoy it—they are all the time and under all circumstances subject to the burdens imposed by high rates of duty upon articles which they do not produce but are compelled to buy and use. When the advantages are set off against the disadvantages, the benefits against the burdens, the balance will be very largely on the wrong side. [Applause.]

Of course our home market has been constantly improving, and under any system of taxation will continue to improve to a greater or less extent with the increase of population and wealth, the extension of the use of machinery, which reduces the cost of production, and the multiplication of facilities for communication and transportation, which reduces the cost of distribution. But how long, Mr. Chairman, are our farmers to be compelled to pay tribute to other industries and wait for the creation of a home market that will take all their own products at fair prices? Among our greatest agricultural products are wheat and cotton. They constitute the main reliance of millions of our people for a profitable use of their lands, and many hundred millions of dollars are invested in the soil and buildings and machinery devoted to their production. Taking the average crop of wheat in this country for several years past, and assuming that there shall be no increase whatever in production, and that the domestic consumption per capita shall remain just at what it now is, there would still be no sufficient home market for this great agricultural staple until our population had reached nearly one hundred million.

The official statistics of the domestic production, exportation, and home consumption of raw cotton show that it would require three times as much machinery and three times as many operatives as we now have to convert this material into commercial fabrics here at home; in other words, we are now compelled to export two-thirds of our product to be manufactured in foreign countries, while one-third only is manufactured at home by all the machinery and labor now employed. In 1880 there were $219,505,000 invested in cotton manufactures, and there were employed in that industry 172,554 hands. To work up our present production of raw cotton would require an investment in this manufacture of $660,000,000 and the employment of 517,662 hands. If we have been more than one hundred years, part of the time under very high tariffs, in so developing our cotton manufactures as to enable them to take one-third of our product at European prices, how many more centuries will be required to enable them to consume the whole product at prices fixed by competition here at home? [Great applause.] When gentlemen have solved this problem to the satisfaction of the American cotton-grower, he may be able to listen with patience to the arguments by which they attempt to convince him of the immense advantages of a home market that will never exist. What is to be done with these great agricultural products, and with many others which are now exported, while the farmers are waiting for the home market which the advocates of restrictive legislation have been promising them for so many years? Are the farmers and planters of the North and South to abandon their wheat and cotton lands or cultivate crops not suited to their soil or climate while gentlemen are making experiments to ascertain whether or not a home market may not be created by legislation? No, sir. No matter what gentlemen may predict or what they may promise, these great industries must go on, and the American farmer must sell his products in any market he can reach and at any price he can get. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], while appearing to admit that the prices of our exportable agricultural products are fixed in the foreign markets in which they are sold, endeavors to avoid the force of the admission by contending that the prices in the foreign market are regulated by the amount of production here. Now, Mr. Chairman, undoubtedly the amount of production here has some influence upon the prices abroad, but the controlling elements are the world's supply and the world's demands. Our farmers do not compete among themselves alone in the provision markets of Europe. Our wheat-growers, for instance, compete with the wheat-growers of England, France, Germany, Russia, Hungary, India, and all the other grain-growers of Europe and Asia, and their product meets in the open and free markets of the world the products of the poorest-paid labor on the face of the earth.

The lately emancipated serfs of Russia, the oppressed peasantry of Hungary, the ryot of India, who lives on millet and rice, wears no garment except a coarse cotton shirt, and sleeps on the floor of a bamboo hut, all pour the products of their labor into the free markets of Europe to be sold in competition with the grain from our Western States and Territories. Sir, our agricultural constituents are not ignorant of the true situation. They know very well that as to all the articles which we are capable of exporting and are actually exporting—and this includes all the principal productions of their industry—the foreign market is just as valuable to them as the home market, for the obvious reason that the prices are fixed abroad, and they receive here only what they could receive there, after deducting the cost of transportation. [Applause.]

What the American farmer most needs is a home market in which he can purchase his supplies as cheaply as his competitors purchase theirs [applause]; and if he can not secure this, then he simply asks the poor privilege of making his purchase where he is compelled to make his sales, and to be permitted to bring his goods home without being compelled to pay unreasonable taxes and fines by his Government for carrying on a harmless and legitimate business. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, we want not only the home market, but all the markets of the world for the varied products of this great country. [Applause.] We want to send our agricultural products, our cotton, and our breadstuffs, and our provisions to the naked and hungry manufacturing peoples of Europe, and our manufactured products to the agricultural peoples of South America, Mexico, and Asia. We can do this when we determine to trade with other people upon fair terms, but we can not do it so long as we protect England and other manufacturing countries in the great markets of the world upon the pretense of protecting ourselves in our own. Let us diminish the cost of production in our agricultural and manufacturing industries, not by diminishing the wages of labor, but by reducing taxation upon the necessaries of life and upon the materials which constitute the basis of our finished products, and by removing, as far as we can, the restrictions which embarrass our people in their efforts to exchange the fruits of their own toil which they do not need for the commodities of other countries which they do need. [Great applause, loud and prolonged.]

SENATE.

MONDAY, May 21, 1888.

Prayer by Rev. GEORGE M. STONE, D. D., of Hartford, Conn.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting certain information in partial response to a resolution of March 28, 1888, calling for information as to what suits to vacate land patents issued by the United States have been commenced by the direction of the Department of Justice and are now pending in the courts, and the present status of the same, etc.; which was read.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the communication be printed and lie on the table. It does not contain all the information which I desired. I have submitted another resolution on the same subject, which is pending. I will look the communication over. Perhaps it will require a more pointed resolution to get at the real information. After the communication is printed I shall ask the Senate to take action on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter and the accompanying papers will lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of John Pope Hodnett, of the District of Columbia, and petitions of other citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 2794) to pay John Pope Hodnett for services rendered as counsel to the Government in the investigation into affairs of the District of Columbia, acting as such counsel by order of a re solution of the House of Representatives; also for acting as counsel for the workingmen of the District of Columbia for fifteen years last past; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PADDOCK. I present the petition of his excellency, John M. Thayer, the governor of Nebraska, praying for a survey of the headwaters of the Platte River, with a view to constructing storage reservoirs to increase and preserve the water supply for irrigation and other uses in Colorado and Nebraska. There has been much complaint of the withdrawal of the entire water supply of the Platte for irrigation purposes in Colorado during the summer, when the water is very low, leaving none even for the use of stock at the cattle ranches below in Nebraska. It is believed that an abundant supply can be secured throughout the season for all purposes throughout that entire region of country by the storage-reservoir system. Governor Thayer has before called attention to the necessity of action in respect to this matter. Some days ago I presented resolutions on this general subject, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and as the subject is before the Committee on Appropriations, I move that this petition be also referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. I present a petition of the tobacco manufacturers of the city of St. Louis, the largest manufacturers in the West, expressing their views in regard to the tax on tobacco. It is brief, and I ask that it be read.

The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

To the honorable Senators and Members of the House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned, tobacco manufacturers of St. Louis, Mo., respectfully represent that the internal-revenue tax on tobacco is paid, ultimately, by the consumers of tobacco, and that, so far as we can learn, no request for the removal of the tax has ever come from them. On the other hand, the growers of leaf-tobacco complain of the restrictions that are now placed upon the sale of their product; and, with the impression that these restrictions can not be removed except by the total abolition of the tax, they naturally ask that the whole tax be abolished.

That these objections to the present internal-revenue law may be met we respectfully ask that all licenses and restrictions now placed upon the sale of leaf-tobacco be removed, and that the tax on manufactured tobacco be fixed at 2 cents per pound, and the present system of packing and stamping be retained.

This, in our judgment, will give the desired relief to the growers and dealers of tobacco, largely reduce the revenues of the Government, and save the manufacturers and their employés from the loss that a sudden and entire abolition of the tax and the package system would entail.

The present revenue law, which has been in force since 1865, requires manufacturers of tobacco to put up and label their product in packages of a prescribed size. All the methods for manufacturing and packing tobacco have long been and are still adjusted to meet the requirements of this law. Larger factory buildings and additional machinery have been constructed, and a greatly increased force of men and women employed. Should the entire tax, with the system that belongs to it, be abolished, these large factory buildings and the expensive machinery would be partly abandoned and a large number of employés thrown out of work.

We are advised that the bill now before the House of Representatives, known as the Mills tariff bill, provides for the total abolition of the tax on manufactured tobacco, and also provides that a rebate be paid to manufacturers and dealers for stock on hand at the date when the bill becomes a law, but makes no appropriation for the payment of this rebate.

While earnestly urging a reduction of the tax on tobacco to 2 cents per pound, with a rebate covering amount of reduction to be paid to manufacturers and dealers, as provided in the Mills bill, we no less urgently request that an appropriation clause to meet the payments of the rebate be made part of any bill or bills that may embrace a reduction or abolition of the tax on manufactured tobacco.

Very respectfully

I have been absent, in attendance upon a political convention.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending matter is the request of the Senator from Vermont for the present consideration of the bill reported by him. Does the Senator from Virginia object to its present consideration?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask the Senator from Vermont if he will withdraw his request until I can get information from the Chair as to whether the three legislative days have expired within which to enter a motion to reconsider. I only want to have the motion entered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have the Journal examined and inform the Senator later.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. When the Journal is examined, if it is found to be within the time, I shall ask leave to enter a motion to reconsider. I do not want to debate it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will notify the Senator from Virginia after the examination of the Journal. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed now to the consideration of the bill reported by him, the title of which will be again stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 2972) to provide for making the west end of the Smithsonian building fire-proof, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been just reported, the request requires unanimous consent. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $17,500 for the purpose of making the roof of the Gothic chapel at the west end of the Smithsonian building fire-proof, and for other purposes, under the direction of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISH AND FISHERIES REPORT.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a House concurrent resolution for the correction of an error made in the issuing of a document, known as "Fish and Fisheries," to report it favorably, and I ask for its present consideration. I desire to say on behalf of the committee that while it favors the adoption of a resolution designed to reach the mistake which has been made in the House folding-room, it feels like entering its protest against the concurrent resolution in the form in which it is drawn. It is exceedingly argumentative, and in language constructed very badly; but still the committee report it favorably, and ask for its present consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 27, 1888.

Whereas it appears by the report made to the House of Representatives from the Committee on Printing, February 16, 1888, that there are in the hands of the Public Printer 507 sets of the document known as Fish and Fisheries, held by him for sale; and

Whereas it also appears by said report that in prorating these books about the 1st of February, 1886, a mistake was made by prorating 6,000 copies instead of 5,000 copies, the actual number printed for the House. This mistake credited each member with 3 more sets of this book than they were entitled to receive, making the folding-room about 1,000 sets short of the number credited. As the mistake was not discovered for nearly eighteen months after, and very many members had in the mean time drawn the number thus placed to their credit, it was too late to fully correct the error. After it was discovered, however, 3 sets were deducted from the accounts of members who had that number still remaining to their credit, and where only 1 or 2 sets were to the credit of members the account was canceled. On account of this error there are 437 sets of this book still to the credit of members and ex-members which can not be furnished until some provision is made to supply the folding-room with that quantity of them:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That the Public Printer be directed to withhold from sale and turn over to the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives 437 copies of the document known as "Fish and Fisheries," the same to be used in making good to the respective members of Congress entitled thereto under the joint resolution passed July 21, 1882, the deficiency occurring to them by reason of the mistake made in the prorating and distribution of such documents under said resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. That was no doubt an inadvertence. I think the Senate had better agree to accomplish the object sought for by the other House, but to put the resolution in the usual form. In its present form it embodies the report as well as the resolution. An amendment could be made striking that out.

Mr. MANDERSON. It embodies the whole argument for the conclusion that is reached, but it comes to us as a concurrent resolution adopted by the House of Representatives, concerning a matter that is entirely their own. Therefore, although feeling that it was quite objectionable in its form, we felt like taking it as we had received it.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think I shall withdraw my assent as a member of the Committee on Printing to the report. The resolution is ungrammatical, badly drawn, verbose, and I was about to say ridiculous. All that is necessary would be three lines, to change the account kept in the folding-room of such a document. I ask that the resolution may be recommitted.

Mr. MANDERSON. Let it go on the Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY. Very well; let it stay on the Calendar.

Mr. MANDERSON. I suggest that the resolution be placed on the Calendar, and we can look at it again and put it in proper form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 2974) for the relief of Thomas Holmes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2975) for the relief of William Barrymore; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2976) for the relief of Patrick L. Dunn; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2977) granting a pension to Henrietta Brown; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAMPTON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2978) for the purchase of a portrait of Maj. Gen. Ward B. Burnett, etc.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, introduced a bill (S. 2979) granting a pension to Mrs. Laura J. Ives; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2980) to amend section 707 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2981) granting a pension to Walter N. Smith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 2982) granting a pension to Ellen M. Thornton; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2983) to secure to the people the enjoyment of the first day of the week as a day of rest, and to promote its observance as a day of religious worship; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to say in regard to this bill that, as the Senate has observed, many thousands of petitions of citizens of the United States have been presented during this and the former Congress for the better observance of the Sabbath day. The petitions were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, which gave the representatives of the petitioners a hearing. They were requested to formulate a bill embodying their ideas, but have failed to do so, and at their request I have endeavored to draw one which I think will facilitate their purposes. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 2984) granting a pension to Olive I. Workman and Philena E. Hershman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COKE introduced a bill (S. 2985) for the erection of a public building at Brownsville, Tex.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 2986) to incorporate the American Historical Association; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 2987) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of George S. Ackerson; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 2988) for the relief of Andrew R. G. Smith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO BILL.

Mr. HALE, Mr. HAWLEY, and Mr. PLATT submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ENLISTMENT OF MARRIED MEN.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to consider and report whether some amendment to the laws ought not to be made prohibiting the enlistment in the Army of the United States in time of peace of men with wives or families dependent on them for support without notice to or consent of their wives.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to observe, in sending the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs, that I suppose it is within the experience of every Senator that our existing law and practice relating to Army enlistments operate with the most extreme cruelty upon many worthy and deserving families. The head of a family, on whom they are entirely dependent for support, in a fit of gloom, or of intoxication, when so far recovered as to have the power to make a legal contract, ties himself up in the service of the Government for the period of enlistment—for five years. The sufferer is not the man chiefly, but the innocent and dependent wife or child or aged parent who is dependent.

The laws of nearly all our States put it out of the power of the husband to convey the homestead or to convey the entire interest in other real estate without the consent of the wife. It puts it out of the power of the wife to make a like conveyance without the consent of the husband. The enlistment law in the United States Army operates as a man-trap, by which what is more important than the homestead or other real estate, the actual earning capacity of the head of the family, is removed from the household for a long space of time.

Whether my honorable friend at the head of the Committee on Military Affairs, who is one of the most humane men I know of anywhere, can devise some change in the practice which will at least put it in the power of the Secretary of War and make it his duty in fit and proper cases, where enlistment has taken place without the consent or knowledge of the wife, to discharge the soldier, I do not know; but it seems to me that it would be better to increase the pay of the soldiers of the rank and file in our own Army by 50 per cent. rather than to have the existing cruel arrangement continue without some mitigation of its severity.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LAND-PATENT SUITS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a former day, submitted by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], relative to suits authorized by the Department of Justice to vacate certain land patents issued by the United States. What disposition does the Senator from Nevada desire to have made of the resolution?

Mr. STEWART. The resolution may lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table for the present.

CONSIDERATION OF THE FISHERIES TREATY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In response to the suggestion made by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER] the Chair states that an examination of the Journal discloses the fact that the resolution to which he called the attention of the Chair was acted upon adversely on Monday last. More than two legislative days having intervened, a motion to reconsider can not be received.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask the Chair——

Mr. HAWLEY. I am inclined to think that is a matter of executive session. If so, it is not in order now.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask the Chair to hear me one minute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia will proceed.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The RECORD shows that a report was made on the resolution by the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] adversely, and on May 14 it was considered and rejected. It is the second time that the resolution was reported in my absence; the second time it was taken up and considered in my absence. I find that there is a rule which justifies me in asking unanimous consent to have the vote reconsidered.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator does not wish to take it up now?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. No, sir; I do not want to take it up now. Rule XIII provides that—

> When a question has been decided by the Senate any Senator voting with the prevailing side may, on the same day or on either of the next two days of actual session thereafter, move a reconsideration; and if the Senate shall refuse to reconsider or, upon reconsideration, shall affirm its first decision, no further motion to reconsider shall be in order unless by unanimous consent.

I think that, having offered the resolution some time ago, it having been reported here twice and acted upon each time in my absence, each time when I was paired on the vote itself, so far as the treaty was concerned, I may ask the Senate to give unanimous consent that I may have entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was rejected. I think it is nothing more than right that the Senate should allow that motion to be entered. I shall not ask the Senate to hear any debate on this subject to-day; I shall not ask it to consider the question of the fisheries; but the Senators themselves, I think, owe it each to the others, as they have expressed themselves around this Hall, to allow me at some time to have this matter considered when I am in the Senate Chamber.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, to enter a motion to reconsider, and then whatever disposition the Senate shall make of that motion will be conclusive to me. I would prefer that the motion should lie on the table, so that I can call it up hereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent to enter a motion to reconsider the action of the Senate on the resolution to which he has referred. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the motion to reconsider is entered.

Mr. HOAR. I should like, with the leave of the Senate, to observe that the taking up of the resolution at the time it was done was by the express and urgent personal request of the Senator from Virginia. It was his desire that it should be taken up before certain other matters should be reached.

JAMES L. HENDERSON.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is it in order now to proceed to a case on the Calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that under the unanimous consent entered last week, if there be no further morning business the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to pass a particular bill, which is one of three that I should like to have go together. It is a bill about a public building in Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the execution of the order of the Senate, the Chair announces the close of morning business and the consideration of the Calendar under Rule VIII, which is to be resumed at Order of Business 1082, the title of which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. Order of Business 1082, a bill (H. R. 314) authorizing the Secretary of War to place the name of James L. Henderson on the roll of Company B, Sixteenth Kentucky Volunteers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent——

Mr. SHERMAN. I withdraw the request. I will not interfere with the Calendar. Let it go on. At some later hour of the day perhaps I may ask the Senate to indulge me.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 314) authorizing the Secretary of War to place the name of James L. Henderson on the roll of Company B, Sixteenth Kentucky Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS G. CORBIN.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask that the Senate consider Order of Business 420, which was on the Calendar and passed over during my absence several days ago. It is Senate bill 1232.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been passed over on a former day without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar, the Senator from Pennsylvania asks that it be now considered. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1232) for the relief of Thomas G. Corbin. It provides that Thomas G. Corbin, now a captain on the retired-list of the Navy, shall be considered as having remained upon the active-list of the Navy next after J. W. A. Nicholson, and as having passed through the various grades through which he would have passed had he so remained on the active-list and been promoted according to seniority and retired as a rear-admiral upon reaching the age of sixty-two years; and that in computing the benefits which he shall thereby receive he shall be considered as having been upon leave or waiting-orders until the date when he would have been so retired.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report in that case be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

Mr. CAMERON. I will state that the bill has already passed the Senate twice and passed the other House once, but failed to become a law because of the want of action by both Houses at the same session.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the effect of the bill? Is it to give back pay for fifteen or twenty years?

Mr. CAMERON. It gives him just what he is entitled to.

Mr. COCKRELL. If he is entitled to it, he can go in the Court of Claims and secure his rights.

Mr. CAMERON. No, he can not.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then he is not entitled to what is claimed.

Mr. CAMERON. Yes, he is, as you will see by the report.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. CAMERON February 23, 1888, as follows:

> The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Thomas G. Corbin, beg leave to submit the following report:
> This bill has several times been before the Naval Committee of the Senate, and each time has received a favorable recommendation.
> This committee now report the bill back to the Senate with a recommendation that it do pass, for the reasons set forth in the following report, made in the last Congress, which is hereby adopted and made a part of this report:
> [Senate Report No. 719, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]
> The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1262) for the relief of Thomas G. Corbin, have duly considered the same, and beg leave to submit the following report:
> Three favorable reports have been made by this committee and three by the House Committee on Naval Affairs in the Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, and Forty-eighth Congresses, respectively, on bills for the restoration of Capt. Thomas G. Corbin, United States Navy, to the position in the Navy of which he was deprived by retirement in consequence of the action of a board of promotion. One of these bills passed the Senate in the Forty-eighth Congress, but was not reached in the House.
> The committee append and adopt the statements and conclusions of the report made to the Senate in the last Congress, and in further support thereof have added a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, found in House Report No. 701, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.
> Since this matter was first brought to the attention of Congress Captain Corbin has reached the age (sixty-two years) prescribed for retirement by section 1444, Revised Statutes. The bill now reported does not, therefore, contemplate his restoration to the active-list of the Navy, but leaves him on the retired-list, only changing his rank and pay to that which he would have attained if he had not, as the committee believe, been unjustly deprived of his promotion.
> [Senate Report No. 178, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]
> The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 427) for the relief of Thomas G. Corbin, have fully considered the same, and beg leave to submit the following report:

The facts in this case are well stated and fully set forth in the following report made by the Committee on Naval Affairs of this body in the Forty-seventh Congress:

"The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 14) for the relief of Thomas G. Corbin, have duly considered the same, and beg leave to submit the following report:

"The bill proposes to authorize the President of the United States to restore Thomas G. Corbin, now a captain on the retired-list of the Navy, to the active-list, to take rank next after Commodore J. W. A. Nicholson, with restitution, from December 12, 1873, of the difference of pay between that of a commodore on the active-list on waiting-orders pay and that of a captain retired on half-pay.

"The act of April 21, 1864, 'to amend an act entitled "An act to establish and equalize the grade of line officers of the United States Navy," approved July 16, 1862,' provides:

"'That no line officer of the Navy upon the active-list below the grade of commodore, nor any other naval officer, shall be promoted to a higher grade until his mental, moral, and professional fitness to perform all his duties at sea shall be established to the satisfaction of a board of examining officers to be appointed by the President of the United States. And such board shall have power to take testimony, the witnesses, when present, to be sworn by the president of the board, and to examine all matter on the files and records of the Department in relation to any officer whose case shall be considered by them.

"'SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That such examining board shall consist of not less than three officers senior in rank to the officer to be examined.

"'SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That any officer, to be acted upon by said board, shall have the right to be present, if he desires it; and his statement of his case on oath, and the testimony of witnesses, and his examination, shall be recorded. And any matter on the files and records of the Department touching each case as may, in the opinion of the board, be necessary to assist them in making up their opinion, shall, together with the whole record and finding, be presented to the President for his approval or disapproval of the finding. And no officer shall be rejected until after such public examination of himself and the records of the Department in his case, unless he fails to appear before said board after having been duly notified.'

"The whole case narrows down to a simple interpretation of the true intent and meaning of the sections just quoted.

"Your committee have carefully examined Captain Corbin's history while in the naval service, and find that his record is unexceptionable and without blemish. He was appointed acting midshipman in 1838, and passed through all the intermediate grades of the service, having acquitted himself in a most meritorious and gallant manner throughout the entire war, and in July, 1866, was promoted to the rank of captain.

"On the 21st day of May, 1873, Captain Corbin was ordered to report in Washington to Rear-Admiral Rodgers for examination preliminary to promotion. In obedience thereto he appeared before the examining board, and was referred to the medical board for physical examination. This board examined and recommended him as physically qualified for promotion. He was then informed by the examining board that he would be required to submit to an oral examination to test his proficiency in the knowledge of his profession. He refused to submit to this oral examination on the ground that it was entirely beyond the purview of the act of April 21, 1864, and declined to appear before the board. Captain Corbin was thereupon discharged from further attendance before the board, who submitted a report to the Secretary of the Navy, refusing to recommend him for promotion. The Secretary then offered him an opportunity to reconsider his determination not to appear before the examining board, of which privilege he again declined to avail himself. The papers in the case were then, by request of Captain Corbin, placed before the President, who sustained the action of the Department. Captain Corbin still declining to appear before the board for the purpose of an oral examination, on January 5, 1874, he was, by order of the Secretary of the Navy, placed upon the retired-list. This is the sum and substance of the whole case.

"Your committee, after maturely examining the act of April 21, 1864, are of the opinion that it leaves it optional with the officer to be present or absent during the examination. The act simply intended the ascertainment of an officer's fitness, mentally, morally, and professionally, by examination of witnesses and records. The framers of the act could not have meant to subject an officer like Captain Corbin, who had served his country faithfully and gallantly for thirty-five years, to the humility of an oral examination before he could receive that promotion which he so eminently deserved. Such an examination of young midshipmen about entering the Navy, or of clerks about entering one of the Government Departments might be proper enough, but to require a person of the age and service of Captain Corbin to submit to such a thing would be unfair and unjust in every respect.

"The following letter, from Hon. G. V. Fox, formerly Assistant Secretary of the Navy (who shaped and administered the act of April 21, 1864), to Senator EDMUNDS, explains the intent of this law:

'WASHINGTON, D. C., February 17, 1881.

'DEAR SIR: I inclose Senate report No. 743, and House report No. 116, Forty-sixth Congress, third session, in reference to the case of Capt. T. G. Corbin, United States Navy. I am able to write to you with confidence that the conclusions of these two committees as to the true meaning of section 3 of the act of April 21, 1864, agree with the intent of the Navy Department, which shaped and administered this law.

'The act of July 16, 1862, neither required nor permitted the presence of any officer whose case was pending. This was made a subject of complaint by those who suffered from the action of the board; but it was more specious than valid, because the true measure of merit entitling an officer of the senior grades to promotion is not an oral examination, but the record of his whole career on the files of the Navy Department as established by himself. The inefficient clamored to be present because before a board, where there was no public prosecutor, they hoped to exert a personal and sympathetic influence. They reasoned well, and the authors of section 3, act of April 21, 1864, offset it by requiring that those who chose to be present should be "examined," and the board were also required to use "any matter on the files and records of the Departments touching each case."

'This is the briefest explanation I can give you of the two acts referred to, and the reasons for putting in the option of being present. This legislation was for the purpose of raising the spirit of the Navy by removing from the active-list the drunkards and imbeciles. It had no reference to and was not intended to act upon officers whose record was blameless.

'I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

'G. V. FOX.

'Hon. GEORGE F. EDMUNDS,
'United States Senate, Washington, D. C.'

"Under section 4 of act of July 16, 1862, no interrogation of officers upon professional subjects was ever made, because their professional reputation was satisfactorily established by the records of the Department and testimony of witnesses. A similar interpretation of section 3 of the act of 1864 was doubtless intended, otherwise that act would never have given the candidate for promotion the option of appearing or not appearing before the examining board. It requires his presence before the board of naval surgeons to ascertain his physical fitness, but it leaves his mental, moral, and professional qualifications to be ascertained from the files of the Department and the testimony of his brother officers. The evidence from that source is very complimentary to Captain Corbin, and can be referred to, if desired, in the papers accompanying the bill. Rear-Admiral C. H. Davis, Commodore C. R. P. Rodgers, and Capt. D. M. Fairfax, United States Navy, in answer to interrogations propounded by the Navy Department relative to Captain Corbin, state that his reputation is the very best and that his habits are excellent; and they all pronounce him as well qualified in every respect for promotion. Commodore Rodgers says in his statement that 'he,' referring to Captain Corbin, 'is one of the ablest officers in the Navy,' and, in answer to the question, 'Would you, as commander of a squadron, have sufficient confidence in Captain Corbin to send him on an important separate service in command of a vessel of war?' says, 'I would. I should esteem myself happy in having such an officer to send on any service.'

"Commodore Rodgers was also asked this question: 'Do you or not consider Captain Corbin to be mentally, morally, and professionally a fit officer to perform all his duties at sea in a higher grade?' And his answer was: 'I do so consider him eminently qualified.'

"It was the duty of the examining board to summon reliable witnesses to testify as to whether, in their opinion, based on actual knowledge of and contact with Captain Corbin, he was mentally, morally, and professionally qualified to fill a higher rank than the one he held. It was also its duty to call upon the Department for all the papers connected with his naval career, to examine them carefully, to see whether he has ever been charged with conduct unbecoming an officer, or whether he has ever been guilty of intemperance, and when it had done that its power ended; it could go no further, and it was its duty to either recommend or not recommend him for promotion, as the evidence might justify, and any examination beyond this was a usurpation of power totally unwarranted by law. That Captain Corbin was a brave, honest, intelligent, and reputable naval officer there is no doubt; neither is there a doubt but that he was unjustly dealt with in being placed upon the retired list without cause.

"Being satisfied as to his entire fitness for promotion, your committee report the bill back to the Senate without amendment and recommend its passage."

'NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 17, 1882.

"SIR: The bill for the relief of Captain Corbin, which has been referred to me for my opinion, has received at my hands due consideration.

"I do not deem it necessary to decide whether Captain Corbin was right or wrong in declining to submit to the oral examination tendered him by the board of officers on the 21st of May, 1873. He believed that he was not compelled by law to submit to that examination. In that opinion he was sincere. The opinion was sustained by that of Hon. G. V. Fox, formerly Assistant Secretary of the Navy, who shaped and administered the law with reference to examinations for promotion. The report of Senator CAMERON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, on the 12th of January, 1881, conforms to the view taken by Captain Corbin and concurred in by Hon. Mr. Fox.

"A different view of the law was held by the examining board before which Captain Corbin was summoned. The Secretary of the Navy at the time approved the action of the board and the President adopted the opinion of the Secretary. In this conflict of judgment I repeat that I do not deem it necessary at this date to decide whether or not the course adopted by Captain Corbin was legally correct. The case is one where an officer, conspicuous for his faithful performance of duty during many years, and for his gallant conduct on all occasions, and his firm adherence to the cause of the Union under circumstances of unusual trial, appeals to his country to be relieved from a position which he honestly believes correct, and in which belief he was sustained by distinguished authority. In view of all these considerations, and of the further fact that the restoration asked by Captain Corbin must necessarily terminate in about six months from this date by reason of his reaching the age for retirement, I think the prayer of his petition should be favorably considered, and the bill for his relief should be promptly passed by Congress.

"I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"WILLIAM H. HUNT,
"Secretary of the Navy.

"Hon. J. H. KETCHAM,
"House of Representatives."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS J. TAYLOR.

The bill (H. R. 2161) for the relief of Thomas J. Taylor was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Thomas J. Taylor of $861 as compensation for services rendered by him as a scout during the late war of the rebellion, the services having been rendered under written instructions of the commanders of the Federal Army commanding the Department of the Tennessee.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ABIAL G. CHAMBERLAIN.

Mr. HOAR. Is the Senate now going on with the Calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; under Rule VIII.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the Chair shall now lay before the Senate and the Senate take up for consideration a pension bill just received from the other House, a bill granting a pension to Abial G. Chamberlain. If the bill is read for information, and the certificates which I hold in my hand showing that the case is one of extreme urgency, there will be no difficulty in the way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. 8489) granting a pension to Abial G. Chamberlain was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions of the pension laws, the name of Abial G. Chamberlain, late Company K, First Massachusetts Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $45 per month in lieu of the pension now received by him.

Mr. HOAR. Let the Secretary now read the letter from the wife, and a certificate of the physician, with the report of the House Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers will be read if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

BLACKWOOD PLACE, BROCKTON, MASS., May 16, 1888.

HONORED SIR: Please add this paper of Doctor Paine's to those on file in relation to my husband's pension. I declare to you, and to all the world, that my husband, Col. A. G. Chamberlain, late captain First Massachusetts Volunteers, is wholly incapacitated from even feeding himself. He has lost his mind, and his mouth is stiff from paralysis caused from the effects of the wound in mouth. I fear lockjaw; he is paralyzed almost wholly. I have to lift him whenever he is moved in bed; he can not turn himself even.

Please send his pension, or see that it is sent. It is one of the clearest cases on record of total disability. If you can not prove it send some one to see the dying man, and please send relief before too late.

Yours, in trouble,

MRS. E. R. B. CHAMBERLAIN.

GOV. J. D. LONG.

Please read this, and act, for the love of Christ, for an officer's wife of the late war.

BROCKTON, MASS., May 16, 1888.

This is to certify that I have examined Abial G. Chamberlain (late captain Second Massachusetts Volunteers) this date.

I find him confined to his bed, very much emaciated, the left leg being flexed on thigh and very rigid, being nearly impossible to straighten it; the left arm being somewhat the same. He still has involuntary condition of bowels and bladder. He requires an attendant all of the time, he being helpless. I further say I have no interest in the case.

A. ELLIOT PAINE, M. D.

The report submitted by Mr. FRENCH, in the House of Representatives, March 27, 1888, was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8489) granting a pension to Abial G. Chamberlain, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Chamberlain was mustered as captain of Company K, First Massachusetts Volunteers, May 24, 1861; promoted to lieutenant-colonel and transferred to the Third Regiment, North Carolina Colored Volunteers, November 10, 1863. He was mustered out of service June 16, 1865. On June 25, 1862, in battle at Fair Oaks, he was severely wounded in mouth and jaw, for which he is now in receipt of a pension at the rate of $20 per month. He filed an application for increase on account of paralysis resulting from the wound, which application has been denied by the Pension Office, the medical referee holding that the paralysis is not chargeable to the wound.

The certificate of the surgeon who examined the pensioner at his home on September 29, 1887, he being unable to leave his room, is as follows:

"I find a scar on the right side of lower lip, extending to jaw, also on the end of tongue. The scar on lip about an inch long, not adherent. Another cicatrix about an inch below the angle of lower jaw, which is adherent to the bone, with an indentation in bone about one-quarter inch in depth and one-half inch in width, not tender to pressure. His walk is feeble and staggering. His intellect is dull; appears bewildered when questioned. The power of motion of left arm and leg is greatly impaired, so as to require help in dressing. He has only partial control of his bladder; his urine runs away, keeping his clothing wet. I think the paralysis is due to cerebral lesion, caused probably by injury of branches of the trifacial nerve, lying in the track of the ball. He is, in my opinion, entitled to total rating for the disability caused by wound of mouth and jaw, and for that caused from resulting paralysis first grade, requiring aid of another person."

Dr. A. Elliott, late assistant surgeon One hundred and fourth United States Colored Troops, under date of February 28, 1888, testifies that claimant is unable to be about his room only as he is assisted. He requires the assistance of some one all the time, he not even being able to attend the calls of nature without being assisted.

Claimant's hearing and eye-sight are likewise impaired by the wound.

The effect of a wound upon the nervous system is at times extraordinary in character, as is well illustrated in cases of lockjaw, following often upon the slightest injury. In this case there is a serious wound, which, in the opinion of the examining surgeon, acting under the special instruction of the Pension Bureau, after a thorough examination of the case, affected the branches of the trifacial nerve. If this is true, and your committee have no reason to doubt the correctness of the surgeon's opinion, the connection of the paralysis with the wound seems to be established. At any rate no other cause for this deplorable condition appears in the case.

Therefore, believing that some relief should be granted this great sufferer, your committee return the accompanying bill, with the recommendation that it do pass, amended, however, by inserting therein, after the word "Volunteers," in last line, the following words: "And pay him a pension at the rate of $45 per month, in lieu of the pension now received by him."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Marie, in the State of Michigan, be, and is hereby, constituted a port of delivery, and;" in line 9, after the words "extended to," to strike out "said port" and insert "the port of Sault Ste. Marie, in the State of Michigan;" so as to read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the privileges of immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise conferred by the act approved June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," be, and the same are hereby, extended to the port of Sault Ste. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROADS TO PRESIDIO RESERVATION, SAN FRANCISCO.

The bill (H. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WATER-RESERVE LANDS IN WISCONSIN.

The bill (S. 1880) declaring that certain water-reserve lands in the State of Wisconsin are and have been subject to the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States," approved March 3, 1875, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to add to the bill the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That the railroad companies availing themselves of this act shall, before entering upon construction, in addition to filing the maps now required by law to be filed, also file maps of definite location of their proposed lines of railroad, and until the approval of said maps by the Secretary of War no construction shall be undertaken; and no location shall be permitted which takes for right of way or stations lands needed for the use of the present reservoir system, or any proposed or probable extension of the same, or which will obstruct or increase the cost of the present or prospective reservoir system; nor shall any railroad company be permitted to take material for construction from any of said reservoir lands outside the right of way granted herein.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to amend the amendment by inserting, after the word "railroad," in line 32, the words:

Over said water-reserve lands, in the office of the Secretary of War.

That is necessary in order to make it appear certain that the maps are to be filed in that office, and not in the office of the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. In lines 33 and 34 I move to strike out the words "no construction shall be undertaken," and insert "the right to occupy said lands shall not vest in such company;" so as to read:

Also file maps of definite location of their proposed lines of railroad over said water-reserve lands in the office of the Secretary of War, and until the approval of said maps by the Secretary of War the right to occupy said lands shall not vest in such company.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. In line 36, after the word "system," I move to insert:

Or in the construction of dams and other works.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move to strike out, in line 29, after the word "shall," the words "before entering upon construction," that point having been covered by the amendments I have already offered.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. I wish the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands would state for the information of the Senate just what this bill proposes to accomplish.

Mr. PLUMB. Some years ago Congress provided for the reservation of considerable tracts of land in the State of Wisconsin, at the headwaters of the Mississippi River, for the purpose of erecting reservoirs whereby the excess of water which fell at certain seasons might be retained until it was necessary to be used for the purpose of feeding the channel of the Mississippi River. These lands were by that act put under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War. It has been held that by reason of such reservation these lands were not subject to what is called the railroad right-of-way act passed in 1875, which gave to all railroads the right of way across the public domain for a certain width, together with a certain right to select depot grounds at stated intervals. This bill simply puts these lands under the operation of the general law, with a provision that no occupation shall interfere with their use for reservoir purposes, and that the occupation shall not extend, as it does under the general law, to the extent of allowing timber and stone to be taken from adjacent lands. It limits the railroad company to the right of way, but it is all the time under the control of the Secretary of War, and all the time under the provision that this shall not in any wise interfere with the use of the lands for reservoir purposes.

I would state that the bill has the concurrence of the Secretary of War, having been submitted to him.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS FOR POST-OFFICE PURPOSES.

The bill (S. 2762) to provide for the erection of public buildings for post-offices in towns and cities where the post-office receipts for three years preceding have exceeded $3,000 annually was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not desire to object to the consideration of this bill under the five-minute rule, but simply to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] has been called away from the Chamber by a domestic affliction in the family of his colleague, and I know that he feels great interest in this bill. I suggest whether it would not be advisable to let it go over without prejudice, retaining its place until he returns to the Chamber.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Wisconsin and myself prepared this bill, and he would have reported the bill but for the fact that he was unavoidably called away from the city at the time I made the report. I made it at his request. If the Senator from Nebraska thinks he desires to be here, I shall not press it now, but I understand that he approves fully of the bill. I am very anxious to have the bill considered. It is a very important one, and I just want to state to the Senate in general terms in regard to this bill that it is unanimously reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It was very carefully prepared, and is intended, I may state generally, to do away with the practice of securing large appropriations for buildings in certain towns and cities of the Union and adopting in lieu of that system a general one for the construction of post-office buildings in all towns and cities of a certain size. It is intended to do away with the great objection suggested by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] and by other Senators, that under the present system certain towns receive enormous appropriations whilst others are entirely neglected. In other words, it is intended to adopt a general equitable system which gives no preference to any locality or to any section of the country, but provides post-office buildings, and also where it is practicable to provide accommodations for the other Departments of the Government.

The architectural structure of these buildings is to be adopted by the Post-Office Department, and where accommodations are sought to be provided for the other Departments they are to be consulted. This is a very important measure. It was recommended by the late Postmaster-General in his last report, and the present Postmaster-General is very much in favor of it.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not desire to be understood as objecting to the consideration of the bill; I am heartily in favor of it, and I think its general scope is certainly to be desired, and if the Senator from Missouri and my colleague [Mr. PADDOCK], who I know has given very much thought to this subject-matter and has had prepared legislation upon it, think the bill had better progress in the absence of the Senator from Wisconsin, I certainly have no objection.

Mr. VEST. I will make this additional statement for the information of the Senate: I notice that the House of Representatives has under consideration, it having been reported from their Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds there, a bill very much like the present bill, differing in detail, but with the same general object. I have not the slightest doubt that, if action is taken by the Senate, the result will be a committee of conference. I mention that fact because if that be so, it is not so absolutely necessary that the Senator from Wisconsin should be present. I know he sympathizes with me entirely in regard to this bill. He and I did the larger portion of the work in preparing it.

Mr. GRAY. Has the Senator made an estimate of the amount of money required to carry the bill into effect?

Mr. VEST. That matter has been considered fully. It always happens that in this matter of estimates as to everything in future, there is a very great difference in calculations. It is supposed by the Postmaster-General that it will take an appropriation of $5,000,000. I will say that the bill in the House provides for $2,000,000, and the bill introduced by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK] I think made an appropriation of $20,000,000, and another bill $10,000,000.

Mr. PADDOCK. The Senator is mistaken in that. My original bill provided for $10,000,000. Then an amendment which I proposed later was for a much less sum.

Mr. VEST. I stand corrected; it was $10,000,000. We considered that matter. It is impossible to say what will be the actual expense. The present bill fixes it at $10,000,000. I think that is the amount.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to ask another question while the Senator from Missouri has the floor, and that is whether the passage of this bill will have any tendency to diminish the special legislation by Congress at every session appropriating for public buildings at particular places?

Mr. VEST. That is the specific object of the bill. Under the present system, as every Senator knows, bills are passed for cities of 12,000 or 15,000 inhabitants where there is simply a necessity for a post-office alone, where there is no internal-revenue department, where there are no United States courts held, where there is nothing but the necessity for a post-office, and these bills come to us with appropriations of one hundred, and one hundred and fifty, and two hundred thousand dollars.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] asks me in regard to the rental of post-offices. We have a report showing the rentals in different localities. I can not undertake to say what the aggregate amount is, but the report of the Postmaster-General shows specifically what is paid in the different towns of the United States. I have not the slightest question that the rent now paid would be more than the interest on the amount appropriated in this bill, but of course I can not speak accurately.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President, early in the session I presented a bill on this subject, which went to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and that bill, I think, contains provisions omitted in this reported bill which ought to be in whatever bill passes on this subject. The bill as reported does not contain some of the essential provisions of that bill and omits others that I should be glad to have incorporated in it.

After the bill was reported by the committee I submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute to cover several of these changes. As a matter of convenience, I put it in the form of a substitute and had it referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and I think that amendment of mine was referred by the chairman of the committee to the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, and by him, I understand, some of the suggestions which I had made before to the committee and which were embraced in my amendment were indorsed by that officer, and a letter was written by him to the chairman of the committee recommending changes in the bill as reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to make it correspond in certain respects with the ideas set forth in the amendment which I presented and which, as I have said, was referred to the Supervising Architect.

In my view one of the chief objections to the bill in its present form is that it provides for setting up in the Post-Office Department another supervising architect's office. If it is necessary in the case of any class of buildings to do that in the Post-Office Department, it may be equally necessary for that class of buildings which would come under the Department of Justice, court-house buildings, that there should be a supervising architect's office in that Department, and so on all the way through the Executive Departments as to the particular Government buildings to be constructed for their use.

I am assured by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury that he can take charge of the entire subject, that he can provide for the additional labor necessary to be done under the requirements of this proposed act without any material additional force. There need be no increase of expense to the Government on this account, and he could combine the whole system of supervising the architectural designs and structure of all public buildings under one office. Besides, it must be remembered that under my amendment the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, and the Secretary of the Interior are required to approve the design, plan, estimates, and cost within the maximum limit.

Mr. STEWART. I inquire of the Senator if he has an amendment to that effect?

Mr. PADDOCK. I have an amendment which was introduced by me some days ago and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, which I propose to offer at the proper time, including that feature to which I have called attention, and in some other respects.

Mr. SPOONER. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Nebraska, in reply to his argument, that if we create an architect's office in the Post-Office Department to supervise post-office buildings it does not follow that we must have an architect in the Department of Justice to supervise the construction of court-houses. The court-houses are comparatively very few as compared with the post-offices.

Mr. PADDOCK. That is true, but under this proposed system every time a new building is to be erected there must be a new bureau of design in substantial duplication of that now existing and another and different responsibility of superintending, thus multiplying cost and dividing responsibilities all the way through. I think all this work should be confined under one head, under one responsibility, and be provided for by one appropriation.

My notion about this is that ultimately the subject of architectural designing and construction of public buildings, together with other kindred works, should be concentrated in one bureau or department of public works. I think it would be to the interest of the Government that all such duties should for the present be left as they are until the duties accumulate from time to time and the office now in charge of this subject shall grow into an independent bureau or department to take charge of public works generally.

Another serious objection to the bill as reported by the committee is that the limitation of the cost of a public building, which is stated at $25,000, is fixed arbitrarily. I think that is a mistake. The limitation to be put upon the cost of a building in every town of the population and importance of those which have made application heretofore, and for which appropriations have been made by special acts, could not, under the maximum rule fixed by the committee, have secured such a building as their necessities required, and all towns of the class that have been provided for by special acts, which have no buildings now, could not, if this rule of the committee should be adopted, be provided for hereafter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to go on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Senator from Nebraska will proceed. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PADDOCK. The trouble is that in trying to escape special legislation and special appropriations for buildings in larger towns we do not avoid it; the necessity will still be upon us just as it is now if the bill passes with the maximum limit proposed by the committee. All that class of towns with the buildings heretofore provided for by special acts can not possibly be provided for under this act with the maximum limitation it contains. Twenty-five thousand dollars will be wholly inadequate for the construction of a building such as may be required for the business of a town of from 15,000 to 30,000 people, and towns having 50,000 to 100,000 would be left out altogether. I propose an amendment such as I have indicated, which limits the maximum of cost to the aggregate amount of receipts of the post-office for which the building is to be provided for three years preceding the order for the construction of the building, which gives a flexible limitation as to the maximum amount of cost; and if in qualification of this limitation you put it under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster-General and the Secretary of the Interior to reduce the limit, if it shall be deemed best to do so in any particular case, it will make it certain that the maximum cost of any building would be wisely and impartially determined. I think this would be a much wiser limitation than the amount fixed in the bill as a maximum. Certainly $25,000 will not provide a building large enough and commodious enough for a town having 15,000, 20,000, or 30,000 people, and would be entirely out of the question for all towns larger than these.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has spoken once, and can only proceed by unanimous consent. [No "objection."]

Mr. CALL. I have considered this subject, and it is an important one, as to the propriety of having architects in the different Departments of the Government to determine with the approval of the different heads of Departments on the buildings to be furnished and the conveniences to be provided for the respective Departments of the Government, or whether all should be under one supervising architect. In order that we may consider this subject carefully, I prefer that the bill should go over, because I know it will give rise to discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida object to the further consideration of the bill?

Mr. CALL. Not yet.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to have the attention of the Senate.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to have the unanimous consent of the Senate to present the amendment to which I have referred, if the bill goes over, in order that it may be printed with the bill in the RECORD for consideration.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the bill be referred back to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with the understanding that it shall be framed so that the work shall be done under the Supervising Architect of the Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. VEST. I believe I have the floor, but I may be mistaken.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator will allow me to say a word further?

Mr. VEST. Very well.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to say in regard to the present Supervising Architect that I think he is an exceedingly efficient man, who will be able to organize and dispose of this work more rapidly than any other officer. Under these circumstances I would not create a new office, because certainly the work will be done more expeditiously under him than under a new officer. He has shown a great deal of capacity in bringing up the work rapidly. I had a conversation with him recently and he said he could attend to the whole business very quickly.

Mr. VEST. I wish to make a single observation. My experience here has been such that I do not think I have ever found a single officer of the Government who was ever willing to give up one particle of his jurisdiction. I have never seen one yet that was willing to give up any of the functions of his Department or bureau or office, and the present occupant of the position of Supervising Architect is no exception to the rule. I say that without intending to say anything derogatory to him, because he is a very good officer as far as I know.

However, in putting this provision in the bill it was designed that the post-office buildings should be under the control of an architect in the Post-Office Department, and it was thought that the Post-Office Department could best judge of the buildings they should have for their work; and the same reason would apply to all the different Departments.

The Supervising Architect of the Treasury, it is said, wants to control the whole matter. He does more work than any other officer of the Government that I know of already. He ought to have a salary of $10,000 a year in order to obtain the best talent and recompense him properly. The Supervising Architect of the Treasury will have control of the buildings under this bill, but not exclusively. The architect of the Post-Office Department will be practically his assistant, and the Supervising Architect of the Treasury will have control of the buildings.

In regard to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK], I wish to say that there is hardly a town in this country where a handsome and commodious building can not be put up for $25,000. There is nothing in which more extravagance and reckless expenditure has been made than in regard to public buildings. I say that from an experience of ten years on the committee having charge of that subject. Twenty-five thousand dollars in the hands of a competent architect will construct a building that will answer for all purposes, that will not only be useful, but beautiful; but it seems that the minute we come to a construction by the Government of the United States all the rules of business are thrown aside, and $100,000 or $150,000 or $200,000 is the least that any one thinks ought to be called for.

The truth may as well be told at once. The Congress of the United States must stop putting up public buildings as a local electioneering instrumentality. Until we adopt the rules that govern men in the prosecution of their own business, the public have a just right to complain of us as to the manner in which we provide for lavish and extravagant expenditures for public buildings.

I hope, sir, that the bill will not go over. There is on the Calendar no more important question. If the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK] want to kill the bill, they can do so now. It is no great question what particular architect shall have charge. What I want is to start this reform.

Mr. PADDOCK. The Senator will allow me a word?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. PADDOCK. I certainly indorse the desire to consider the bill now. I have not suggested that I want it to go over.

Mr. VEST. I want to get this bill up and to understand whether we are to go on with the log-rolling system, session after session, or whether we are to adopt a system to transact this matter as one of business. No man who has been ten years in the Senate can look back at that which has been done in this regard with any feelings of satisfaction.

Mr. STEWART. I concur with most of what the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has said. I think this is in the main a good bill and should be passed. My only objection is that it will create another office and multiply the expense of doing business which ought to have one head. If the Supervising Architect of the Treasury has not enough force, add to it; but the work will be done more cheaply and efficiently by having it all in one office. That is my objection, and I hope the Senator from Nebraska will introduce his amendment now, and let the bill pass as amended.

Mr. PADDOCK. I send the amendment to the desk as a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has not been read through. The reading was interrupted. After the reading is concluded amendments will be in order. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (H. R. 8560) to establish a department of labor.

Mr. HARRIS. That is to be set aside by unanimous agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill relative to post-office buildings will be continued as in Committee of the Whole.

The reading of the bill (S. 2762) was resumed and concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK] offers an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause, and in lieu thereof to insert——

Mr. STEWART. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will withhold his amendment to allow the original bill to be dissected and amended first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska withdraw his amendment?

Mr. PADDOCK. The change in the mind of the Senator from Nevada is not the only one I desire. There are several changes which I would like to have made, and therefore I offer my amendment now as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. STEWART. I thought we might first propose to strike out the provision for a new architect, and let the bill be perfected before we vote on a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be prepared by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury a design, plans, working drawings, and specifications for post-office buildings, which, before being adopted, shall be approved by the Postmaster-General, Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Interior, which design and plans shall be so devised as to provide for the construction of buildings of such dimensions as may be required for the transaction of the business of Presidential post-offices, and said design and plans shall be so made that additions to their capacity may be constructed from time to time without injury to the harmony of the design or usefulness of the building, and such design and plans shall be as nearly uniform as practicable, both as to exterior appearance and internal arrangement, and all such buildings shall be fire-proof and provided with a suitable fire-proof vault.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time cause to be constructed buildings, in accordance with said general design and plans hereinbefore mentioned, for the accommodation of all post-offices the annual gross receipts of which for three years preceding shall have exceeded the sum of $3,000: Provided, That the cost to the United States of any such building shall not exceed the aggregate amount of such gross receipts for such period of three years, and that said cost and the material to be used in the construction of such building shall be determined by the Postmaster-General, Secretary of the Treasury, and Secretary of the Interior, subject to the approval of the President. All contracts for the construction of such buildings, and for materials, fixtures, or apparatus to be used therein, shall be let to the lowest and best bidder, after such advertisements for proposals as the Postmaster-General shall direct, one of which advertisements shall be printed in a newspaper published at the place where such building is intended to be constructed, if any such there be, and if there be none at such place, in some newspaper published nearest thereto.

SEC. 3. That no contract for the construction of any such building shall be made until there shall have been conveyed to the United States, with perfect title, approved by the Attorney-General, a suitable site for such building, of such size as shall afford a clear space of not less than 50 feet in extent on each side of and beyond the limits of such proposed building, and, in addition, so much as in any particular case the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem requisite, nor shall any such contract be made until jurisdiction over such site shall have been ceded to the United States by the State within which the same is situated. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to accept any such site by donation or grant thereof, and contributions to the purchase of such ground or in aid of the construction of the building to be erected: Provided, That the Postmaster-General is also authorized, when in his judgment it shall be necessary, to purchase a suitable site for any such building, at a price not exceeding $5,000, or, where the same can not be otherwise procured, to acquire title by condemnation, in the name of the United States, under the laws of the State within which such site may be situated.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall annually report to Congress a statement of all post-office buildings constructed under the provisions of this act, together with all contracts therefor or relating thereto, and a particular statement of the cost of each during the preceding fiscal year, and also of all contracts for buildings which may be unfinished; and he shall also at the same time report to Congress a list of the buildings, with the estimated cost thereof, to be erected under the provisions of this act during the next ensuing year.

SEC. 5. That whenever, in the opinion of the Postmaster-General, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Interior, it shall be necessary or expedient to provide, at any place where a building is to be erected under the provisions of this act, for the accommodation of Government officials other than those connected with the Post-Office Department, the said building shall be designed and erected with a view to furnishing such accommodation.

SEC. 6. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry out the provisions of this act the sum of $3,000,000, to be drawn from the Treasury and expended during the fiscal year 1889, and the accounts therefor to be audited in the same manner as other expenditures for the postal service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK].

Mr. SPOONER. I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska will not be adopted. I was chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds which considered this subject, and, together with the Senator from Missouri, gave it laborious attention, and we prepared the bill, after a careful study of the subject, in this form, which we thought would guard thoroughly the interests of the Government. I think the inspiration of the main amendment proposed to the bill comes from the Supervising Architect, and is based upon a natural reluctance to see the authority to be exercised under it vested in any other officer; but the bill does not relieve altogether the Supervising Architect of the Treasury from responsibility in connection with the erection of public buildings under this bill.

Mr. PADDOCK. When the Senator says the inspiration incorporated in my amendment comes from the Supervising Architect of the Treasury he is mistaken.

Mr. SPOONER. Then I will change it and say that it meets the hearty approval of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury. The Supervising Architect of the Treasury, a gentleman whom I do not happen to know personally, is so crowded by the business of his office to-day that it is simply impossible for him to discharge in all respects the functions of that office as they should be discharged. I do not say this to reflect on this officer in the slightest sense, for I think him capable and faithful.

All public-building bills—and I should like the attention of the Senate to this—which have been referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds we have referred immediately to the Supervising Architect of the Treasury with a request that he advise the committee as to the public necessity for the erection of the proposed buildings, and also of his estimate of the probable cost. I believe I am within bounds when I say that in four cases out of six we have received a reply from the Supervising Architect simply communicating to the Senate a letter from the postmaster or some local officer, advising the Supervising Architect of the necessities of the Government in that particular locality, not giving us, however, his judgment of the public necessity and not giving the committee his estimate as to cost.

I do not find any fault with the Architect for this, and do not make the statement to reflect in any wise upon him, for I believe it is impossible, as that department is organized and with the work which it has in hand, for him to respond more intelligently than he does to the demands of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in both Houses for necessary information on the subject. And if in addition to all that, being overwhelmed almost to-day with work, we charge him with the responsibility of supervising the construction of all the post-offices to be constructed under this bill, if the bill shall become a law, it would be, it seems to me, impossible for him to meet the demand of public duty under the circumstances.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin if there will be any difficulty in organizing all the forces wanted for public buildings under one head. If you multiply the offices and have different people doing the same thing, is there not confusion and additional expense? One person having the whole subject in charge could overlook the entire field under him. Why not organize the bureau by adding more force?

Mr. SPOONER. After the enactment of this bill as a law, if it be enacted, the Supervising Architect of the Treasury will have every function left to him which he exercises to-day. It will be his duty to supervise the erection of every public building provided for by Congress by special act, and this very bill does not leave him without a voice as to the post-office buildings to be erected under it. The bill provides that the plans shall be adopted with the assistance of the Supervising Architect. In a sense this Post-Office Department architect is to be subordinate to the Supervising Architect of the Treasury.

It was thought by the committee that as these buildings were to be simply post-office buildings, not buildings pertaining to the class in which court-houses and custom-houses are included, the Post-Office Department would better understand than the Supervising Architect of the Treasury just what the needs of the Department were in each locality. They are not uniform; they may require one construction and plan in one locality and a different construction and plan in another, varying with the needs of the Department. It therefore seemed to us on every ground that it would be better to leave the plans, the arrangements, and the construction of these buildings, limited in their use to post-office purposes, to an architect of the Post-Office Department who would be there in the Department and constantly under the eye of the Postmaster-General and his subordinates.

The other principal amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska relates to the limit of cost. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds thought that $25,000 would erect in almost any community a building adequate for the wants of the Government as a post-office, and enable us in that way to stop the yearly rents which the Government is obliged to pay. That may not in the end be found sufficient. I think it will, however, be adequate in most localities, and this legislation is in a sense experimental. If we find that the limit is too low, Congress can hereafter change it; but vesting in a Department officer or in a board the power to erect generally public buildings of this class throughout the country, we thought it better to put an absolute and fixed limit upon the amount of expenditure.

Mr. REAGAN. Allow me to ask a question.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. REAGAN. It has been contended heretofore that in certain places there ought to be provided a local post-office costing $10,000, or at most $12,000, to supply the average extent of the construction needed for all the offices now of the third class. But this bill goes beyond that, does it not?

Mr. SPOONER. I have no doubt myself that $25,000, properly expended, if the work is done as it ought to be done in the construction of such buildings, will erect a sufficiently handsome structure in almost any locality, and one adapted entirely to meet the wants of the Government. Of course it will not build a structure with much adornment, and we do not wish to provide for the expenditure on a large scale of the public money in that way. I think both amendments proposed by the Senator from Nebraska would not improve, if adopted, the bill.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to have a quotation read on this subject?

Mr. SPOONER. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. VEST. I send to the desk to be read what is marked in the last report of the Post-Office Department.

The Chief Clerk read from page 18 of the annual report of the Postmaster-General for the year ending June 30, 1887, as follows:

Of the whole number of offices chargeable to the Government 86 were, on the 31st of October last, in Government buildings, the heating and lighting of which the Secretary of the Treasury provides for out of the general appropriation for the expenses of the public buildings; 303 were under lease for different terms at a gross annual rental of $285,729.50; besides 50 stations at the rental of $62,621; and to the remainder, money allowances for rent, incurred and to be paid by the postmaster, to the amount in gross for the year of $32,643, have been ordered. Appended hereto is a tabular exhibit, prepared by the law clerk, of the post-office leases in force at the end of the fiscal year; and also an amendatory exhibit showing all the changes up to the 1st day of October. On that day the annual rate of cost for the rentable offices and stations stood at $501,331.50, of which $440,993.50 was for rent, and $60,338 for heating and lighting, not included in rentals; besides 31 offices recently elevated to the second class, the cost of provision for which had not been definitely adjusted.

Should the plan discussed for the reclassification of post-offices meet approval (or should third-class offices of the grade of $1,400 salary and upwards be included in the list of renting), it would add 1,072 offices to the charge of the Department, making altogether 1,589 as they are at present graded; a number to increase gradually from year to year if peace and prosperity continue with us. There are now 104 Government buildings containing post-offices, and the Supervising Architect of the Treasury advises me that 44 Government buildings, which will furnish post-office quarters, are in process of erection, and that special appropriations have been made for 32 more whose construction is not yet begun. Of the 104 in present use, 3, all in the State of Maine, are fourth-class offices; 2, 1 in Maine and 1 in Massachusetts, are of the lowest of the third class, and 1 holds the Georgetown office, now a station of the Washington post-office. This leaves 98, of which 86 are in the first and second classes, and 12 in the third, out of the number of 1,589 proposed for renting, already so provided for, besides 76 which soon will be also in buildings owned by the Government. The number remaining for further provision, on the plan suggested, will therefore be 1,415.

The average rental of the 303 offices now leased is $943; and of the remainder provided by allowances, $604.41; and of the total of both sorts, as now provided for, $857.74; and doubtless suitable premises can be secured for the additional ones proposed, because of their small requirements and location in small places, at an average annual rental not exceeding $400 each, or a total additional cost of $445,800 per year for rent. Add for heating and lighting the estimated sum of $50,000, and the annual charge for quarters for post-offices will become approximately $1,000,000, and increase from year to year at the rate of 3 to 5 per cent.

Mr. SPOONER. There is one proposition involved in the amendment as to which I have some doubt. I have none as to the two features to which I have referred. I believe the bill itself is better than the proposed amendment in those respects.

It will be observed by the Senate that we provide that the buildings to be erected under this bill shall be fairly distributed among the several States and Territories. There is also a provision in the bill, and it is in the bill recommended by the Post-Office Department, that the Postmaster-General may accept a site by donations of ground from different localities, and contributions to the purchase of such ground, or aid in the construction of the building to be constructed. Then it provides that in selecting the locality for the construction of the buildings under the provisions hereof preference shall be given to localities which provide free of expense to the United States ground for sites satisfactory to the Postmaster-General.

I do not, I confess, quite like the proposition that the United States shall be to any extent a beggar of the different localities in which post-office buildings or sites are needed, and I am not certain that it is right or seemly that the distribution of these buildings should be affected by the amount of money given by the different localities to aid in construction, or to aid in the purchase of sites; and, so far as I am concerned, as one member of the committee, I should not object to striking out the language in the bill which regulates the distribution of the buildings according to the contributions made.

Mr. TELLER. Is that in the amendment?

Mr. SPOONER. In the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska. I shall vote for that portion of his amendment.

Mr. PADDOCK. My judgment of that is that it gives preference to the stronger towns which may be located in the East against the weaker towns in the West and South. That is one of my chief objections to the committee plan. I have left that out in the substitute.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Chair state the question again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK] as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I did not know it was a substitute. I wish to say in regard to the remark just made by the Senator from Wisconsin relative to that part of section 4 which relates to the donation of sites, that I think it is exceedingly offensive to put the Government in the attitude of begging from the different localities a site for its own purposes, and especially to give preference to localities so offering sites, thereby interfering with an equal distribution by sections.

One reason why I am in favor of the bill is that it puts the Government out of the begging business. As the thing stands now, the Government forces itself in the matter of rent on different localities, and the Department is engaged, I think, unnecessarily and unwisely and invidiously in playing off one part of a town against other parts, whereby the Government is getting rent in the large towns for either nothing or a mere nominal rent.

The people of the United States to-day support the Post-Office Department; they pay good prices to the railroad companies for carrying the mails; they pay the prices determined by fair competition for carrying the mails on what is called the star-route service; they pay for paper, for twine, for stamps, for bags; they pay good prices to the persons who render service to the Department, and there is no reason in the world why the Government after paying for all these items that relate to the postal service should go to the various towns and say, "We want to build a post-office here and we want it located in such a way as to promote the speculation on one side of the town or the other side of the town, or business on one side of the town or on the other, if you will only give us a building free." The Government ought to get out of that class of business.

Of course, if a site is offered at the proper place and there is no other controlling consideration, there would be no impropriety in the Government taking it; but the provision embodied in this bill is to urge localities to secure the early erection of a building and its location in such a way as to permit private speculation. That, in my judgment, is against public policy.

I hope the Senator from Missouri, whatever he may think about other amendments, will at least consent that all that portion relating to that subject shall be stricken out. I would strike out that portion of the paragraph commencing with the words "the Postmaster-General," in line 12 of section 4, and concluding with the same words, in line 18.

Mr. VEST. Let me make this suggestion, that this portion of the paragraph, from line 11, be stricken out:

The Postmaster-General is authorized to accept any such site by donation or grant thereof, and contributions to the purchase of such ground or in aid of the construction of the building to be erected.

Then strike out, in line 14, the word "and," and all down to "Postmaster-General," in line 16, so as to do away with that provision.

Mr. PLUMB. That would be right enough in itself, if it did not hold out a means whereby one locality would get a public building to the exclusion of another.

Mr. VEST. Does the Senator seek to deny to any locality the right of donating a site to the Government if it sees proper to do so?

Mr. PLUMB. Not at all.

Mr. VEST. Then, why not adopt what I suggest?

Mr. PLUMB. But the Postmaster-General can do that anyhow?

Mr. VEST. I doubt it.

Mr. PLUMB. The head of the Treasury Department accepts donations all the time for public buildings under the present system.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand whether the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] submitted an amendment.

Mr. VEST. I submitted no amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. If it is in order to submit an amendment——

Mr. PADDOCK. Is it in order?

Mr. REAGAN. It is in order to perfect the original bill before voting on the substitute.

Mr. PLUMB. Then I move to strike out of the bill, in section 4, beginning with the words "The Postmaster-General," in line 11, down to and including the same words in line 18.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator from Kansas will permit me a moment, I desire to suggest to him that it might be well to leave in the authority to the Postmaster-General to accept a donation.

Mr. TELLER. No. He has that authority now.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know about that.

Mr. REAGAN. If an amendment to that amendment is in order, I should like to submit an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in order.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I move to strike out all after the word "situated," in line 11 of section 4, down to the words "Postmaster-General," in line 18.

Mr. PLUMB. That is my amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I thought the Senator's amendment commenced at a different place.

Mr. PLUMB. No, at the same place.

Mr. REAGAN. If that is the Senator's motion, I have no motion to make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 4, line 11, after the word "situated," it is proposed to strike out all down to and including the word "Provided," in line 18, as follows:

The Postmaster-General is authorized to accept any such site by donation or grant thereof, and contributions to the purchase of such ground or in aid of the construction of the building to be erected; and in selecting the locality for the construction of buildings under the provisions hereof, preference shall be given to localities which provide, free of expense to the United States, ground for site satisfactory to the Posmaster-General: Provided.

Mr. PADDOCK. Is that amendment in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. PADDOCK. That amendment, I think, is proposed to the original bill and not to my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment is an amendment to the text of the bill, and, of course, an amendment to the amendment would be in order.

Mr. PADDOCK. If the Senator from Kansas will look at the substitute amendment he will see that his amendment, as he has stated it, is an amendment to the bill and not to my amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. It is an amendment to the original bill. I understand the ruling of the Chair to be that it is in order first to perfect the bill before voting on the substitute.

Mr. PADDOCK. Yes; undoubtedly that is true, and the Senator is correct.

Mr. TELLER. As it has been suggested that it is necessary to keep in the words, "The Postmaster-General is authorized to accept any such site by donation or grant thereof," for fear that he should not have that right, I will simply say that that right has been exercised by the executive department of the Government for many years. If there was any question about it, of course he could buy the land at a nominal sum. So it is not necessary to keep that provision in the bill. If it remains, it does seem to be an invitation or a sort of call on the people of a locality to make a present of land to the Government of the United States. It seems to me the whole of it ought to go out.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the objection to that part of the bill which provides for donations of land or money for the construction of post-office buildings is, in my judgment, well founded. The Government requires a building in a city at a certain place such as suits the convenience of the public business; that should be the sole consideration which should control the selection of a site. That being determined, the Government should pay for it its reasonable market value. Certainly if any one wishes to give that to the Postmaster-General without any reservation, he would have the authority to accept it at a reasonable price, which means the market value, or doubtless entirely; but to say in this bill that his judgment should be affected, or to leave an implication for the location of a building somewhere else than the public convenience requires is certainly an error, and it invites any amount of corruption, any amount of double dealing. It is an invitation to people to secure the location of buildings, as has been suggested by other Senators, not at such place as the public convenience of the people may demand, but at such place as the private interests of the donors may suggest, and it is an implied authority to the Postmaster-General, or the officer charged with this duty, to make this selection under the influence of this motive.

For that reason, I think the suggestion to strike out is well founded, and that the provision should be stricken from the bill. It gives no additional authority, but invites an exercise of authority under improper motives and for improper objects.

Mr. VEST. I am not so clear, as a lawyer, about the proposition which has been suggested here as to the general authority existing in any head of a Department to receive a deed from any person who wishes to donate property; but to settle this controversy, if there is any idea that this would lead to any corrupt bargaining for sites, so far as I am concerned (and the Senator from Wisconsin, who is really the sponsor of the bill, I understand agrees to it), let all that part of the section be stricken out, as suggested by the Senator from Kansas, including the word "provided," in line 18, and that would end the discussion as to that point. Then it would be necessary, in line 19, in order to correct the verbiage of the bill, to strike out the word "also," in the clause, "That the Postmaster-General is also authorized." I hope that amendment will be satisfactory to my friend from Florida.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 4, line 11, after the word "situated," it is proposed to strike out all down to and including the word "Provided," in line 18, in the following words:

> The Postmaster-General is authorized to accept any such site by donation or grant thereof, and contributions to the purchase of such ground or in aid of the construction of the building to be erected; and in selecting the locality for the construction of buildings under the provisions hereof preference shall be given to localities which provide, free of expense to the United States, ground for site satisfactory to the Postmaster-General: Provided,

And in line 19, to strike out the word "also" before "authorized;" so that the section when amended would read:

> That no contract for the construction of any such building shall be made until there shall have been conveyed to the United States, with perfect title, approved by the Attorney-General, a suitable site for such building, of such size as shall afford a clear space of not less than 50 feet in extent on each side of and beyond the limits of such proposed building, and, in addition, so much as in any particular case the Postmaster-General shall deem requisite, nor shall any such contract be made until jurisdiction over such site shall have been ceded to the United States by the State within which the same is situated. That the Postmaster-General is authorized, when in his judgment it shall be necessary, to purchase a suitable site for any such building, at a price not exceeding $5,000, or, where the same can not be otherwise procured, to acquire title by condemnation, in the name of the United States, under the laws of the State within which such site may be situated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposed amendment?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to inquire whether that provision has been retained in the bill which requires such a building to be 50 feet from other buildings. If so, I think the limitation of $5,000 to buy a site would not be adequate. It will be perhaps desirable to locate many of these buildings right in the business part of towns where there are already business houses or other buildings erected, and $5,000, if it is to be 50 feet from side to side, would not buy the site in any thriving town in this country. I do not know whether the provision requiring the building to have a space of not less than 50 feet from other buildings has been stricken out or not. I have not been here all day.

Mr. VEST. That has not been stricken out.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then I am sure the sum of $5,000 in any thriving town in this country will not be sufficient to buy a suitable location in the central part of the town where the business interests of the town are. In almost any town not much short of $10,000 will be necessary if a site is to be selected in the business part of the town. There ought to be some change in that respect.

Mr. VEST. I have not the slightest objection to striking out in line 5 of section 4 the limitation as to 50 feet. I had doubts about it when the bill was constructed, but we came to the conclusion that in almost any town in which the gross receipts of the post-office had not exceeded $3,000 a year for three years, $5,000, even with the limitation of 50 feet, would buy a very good site. I know that is the case in the West, but as to what would be the cost upon the Eastern seaboard I am not so well informed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri propose an amendment?

Mr. VEST. I have no objection to the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Delaware, if he wants to strike out the limitation.

Mr. HALE. May I ask the Senator from Missouri a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Is the $5,000 to be paid for a site to be additional to the $25,000 limited as the cost of the building?

Mr. VEST. Certainly; the provision is a specific one as to the ground to be purchased, and then the building is not to exceed in cost $25,000.

Mr. HALE. Now, one further question. What did the examination of the committee upon this subject lead it to believe would be about the size of a town where the gross receipts would amount to $3,000?

Mr. VEST. Let the Senator refer to the response of the Postmaster-General to the following resolution of the Senate:

> That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate, at the earliest practicable date, a list of Presidential post-offices in the United States and in the Territories whose annual receipts for the three last preceding years have exceeded $3,000 per annum; and also a statement of the amount of rent paid by the Government for the accommodation of each such post-office.

It is Executive Document No. 155.

Mr. HALE. Does that cover the point suggested by my question as to the size of a town where the gross receipts would be $3,000? What I am trying to get at is the likelihood of the value of property in a place of a given number of inhabitants.

Mr. VEST. It would be simply impossible, without taking the census and the list of buildings in Executive Document No. 155, and going through and comparing them, to answer that question, as the Senator very well knows that the post-office business is not at all in proportion to the size of a town.

Mr. HALE. I know it is not.

Mr. VEST. There are small towns with a population of 3,000 or 4,000 in which the post-office business exceeds that in towns of 10,000 and 12,000, and for very obvious reasons. All I can answer is that here is a list of the Presidential post-offices in the United States where the gross receipts for three years preceding amount to $3,000.

Mr. HALE. I should take it that it would embrace towns ranging from 5,000 to 8,000 and 10,000 people. Of course it varies with locations and situations, and with peculiar incidental circumstances, but I should think that generally some kind of a rule could be drawn. In some cases a town with 5,000 inhabitants will not have reached $3,000 of gross receipts.

Mr. VEST. That is true.

Mr. HALE. In some cases it would require a town of 7,000 or 8,000 inhabitants to reach gross receipts to the amount of $3,000, and I did not know but that there was some average.

Mr. VEST. I do not think any rule could be established, from the nature of the case.

Mr. REAGAN. When the Senator from Maine asked about the cost of such a building I was about to say that the estimate of the Postmaster-General as to the probable cost, as to what would be sufficient for post-offices at third-class offices, is from $10,000 to $12,000, and for other offices not to exceed $20,000. That is the estimate he states in his report.

Mr. PADDOCK. I rose to make a suggestion to the Senator from Maine, that I thought he would discover, if he made an examination, that towns where the gross receipts are $3,000 would have an average population of 4,000 to 4,500, probably not to exceed in any case where a town is well established 4,500.

Mr. HALE. That is rather less than what I supposed. It is more of an answer to my question than I succeeded in getting before.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] propose any amendment?

Mr. SAULSBURY. In section 4, line 5, in the clause which requires he clear space to be "not less than 50 feet in extent on each side of and beyond the limits of such proposed building," I move to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty." There is no necessity to have a space of 50 feet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Delaware will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 5 of section 4, before the word "feet," strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty;" so as to read:

Of such size as shall afford a clear space of not less than 30 feet in extent on each side of and beyond the limits of such proposed building.

Mr. SAULSBURY. At the suggestion of friends, I will move to strike out without inserting anything, but leave it to the discretion of the Postmaster-General, who is to approve the plan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Delaware indicate the words he proposes to strike out?

Mr. SAULSBURY. In lines 5, 6, and 7, strike out the words "of not less than 50 feet in extent on each side of and beyond the limits of such proposed building."

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator from Delaware will permit a suggestion, I suggest that he modify his amendment so that it shall insert the word "sufficient" before the word "clear" and strike out the words "of not less than 50 feet in extent." It would then read:

A suitable site for such building, of such size as shall afford a sufficient clear space on each side.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am willing to accept that suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read at the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 5, before the word "clear," insert the word "sufficient," and in the same line, after the word "space," strike out the words "of not less than 50 feet in extent;" so as to read:

A suitable site for such building, of such size as shall afford a sufficient clear space on each side of and beyond the limits of such proposed building.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposed amendment?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest to the Senator from Delaware that that amendment would not meet the case. It provides that there shall be a clear space included in the site, so that if a building shall be located on the street the space afforded by the street is excluded from that which the terms of the bill would require for the erection of the building; whereas, on the other hand, if it were provided that it shall afford a clear space, including streets and alleys, of a certain amount it would meet the case, it seems to me.

Take most of the Western towns; they are laid out in blocks, and the blocks are subdivided into quarters. The usual dimension of the quarter-blocks is 132 feet by 132 feet, but those quarter blocks are bounded on two sides by alleys and on two sides by streets. If the proposition contained in the bill without amendment should be retained, a building put in the center of one of those 132-feet-square blocks would not comply with the requirements of the bill.

I think if the amendment of the Senater from Delaware should be adopted, still the one I suggest, to insert after the word "space," in line 5, "including streets and alleys," should be properly made.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no objection to that amendment. My only object was not to have the size of the site so large that it could not be bought for the money specified in the bill. I am satisfied that in almost any thriving town $5,000 can not buy a suitable site for the location of a post-office if the site is to have the dimensions specified in the bill. I know that a few years ago there was a small post-office built in my town, and the engineer went down and selected a site on which there was a frame dwelling-house. He paid $8,000 for the site, the owner moving everything off. I know that in certain towns in my State, and I suppose it is so in all States, if a site is selected in the business part of the town it will require $10,000 to procure a site such as is provided for in the bill. My only object is to secure a proper site for the building.

Mr. VEST. I suggest to the Senator from Delaware, in order to meet his statement of the case, that in line 5, after the word "as," the words "shall afford a clear space of not less than 50 feet in extent on each side of and beyond the limits of such proposed building, and, in addition, so much as in any particular case," be stricken out, and then the section as amended would read, that there shall be purchased "a suitable site for such building, of such size as the Postmaster-General shall deem requisite." That puts no limitation upon the discretionary power of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am willing to leave that in the discretion of the Postmaster-General.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware proposes to modify his amendment. The amendment will be stated as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 5, after the word "as," it is proposed to strike out the words:

Shall afford a clear space of not less than 50 feet in extent on each side of and beyond the limits of such proposed building, and, in addition, so much as in any particular case:

So as to read:

A suitable site for such building, of such size as the Postmaster-General shall deem requisite; nor shall any such contract be made until jurisdiction over such site shall have been ceded to the United States by the State within which the same is situated.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 15th instant approved and signed the act (S. 2267) for the relief of the Omaha tribe of Indians in Nebraska, to extend time of payment to purchasers of land of said Indians, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the President had on the 16th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 2605) relating to the anchorage of vessels in the port of New York;

An act (S. 333) granting a pension to Reuben Brownmiller;

An act (S. 334) granting an increase of pension to Charles F. Allgower; and

An act (S. 734) granting a pension to guardian of Enos J. Searles, of Clermont County, Ohio.

The message further announced that the President had on the 17th instant approved and signed the act (S. 1204) to provide for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States at Martinsburgh, in the district of West Virginia.

KANSAS RAILROAD GRANTS.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Printing at this time, on a matter which seems to require some haste.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received, if there be no objection.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting certain information relative to railroad land grants to the State of Kansas, and to suggest to the Senate that it be not printed. It seems to be a matter that is entirely local and of no general interest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska, from the Committee on Printing, reports back a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of January 17, 1888, information relative to railroad land grants to the State of Kansas, with the recommendation that it be not printed.

Mr. PLUMB. That report is desired for evidence in a suit now pending in the United States circuit court for the district of Kansas. I move that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to transmit the same to the United States district attorney for the district of Kansas for use in that suit, to be returned to the Secretary at such time and under such direction as he may give.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. On which question are we voting?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the nature of these papers, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is a letter from the Secretary of the Interior in response to a Senate resolution of January 17, 1888, transmitting information relative to railroad land grants to the State o Kansas.

Mr. REAGAN. Is it not somewhat remarkable that the Senate should collect evidence for suits in the courts? I do not think that I have ever known of such a thing before.

Mr. PLUMB. I had a letter some time since from the district attorney for Kansas asking me for this report, and I had a letter also from the counsel associated with him in the cause. It is a suit begun by the Attorney-General of the United States for the purpose of setting aside the conveyance of certain land made to a railroad company, and joined with the United States district attorney the counsel who represent particularly the settlers on those lands have been desirous for months of getting this information. Whether they want it because they have not been able to get it from the General Land Office or otherwise I do not know; but it is certainly proper they should have it; and while I would not say that the resolution was offered for the purpose of obtaining it, because I had no such purpose, although the resolution was prepared by gentlemen who are interested in the proceedings, at the same time it is useful for this purpose, and I do not know of any other purpose that it is useful for.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it is absolutely unprecedented for the Senate to allow to go out of its possession, except in charge of some of its officers, for purposes of justice, any original paper that may be on its files. Therefore on principle I should be opposed to agreeing to such a motion as the Senator from Kansas suggests. Then I will add to him (which will occur to him in a moment when I suggest it) that this letter or report of the Secretary of the Interior is not certified in the way that the laws of the United States require information from the Departments to be certified, and being sent there it would not be received in evidence for a single moment; that is, it would not be open to discussion. The Attorney-General or a private citizen, because the law provides for that, can get a certified copy of these papers from the Department of the Interior on application, when they would be admissible in a court of justice, if they were otherwise admissible in respect of the subject they applied to. I hope the Senator will withdraw the motion.

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw the motion for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn. The Committee on Printing will be discharged from the further consideration of the matter, and the accompanying papers will lie on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, or be placed on file, whatever is the proper course.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. FRYE. I ask leave, out of order, to report back the river and harbor bill with certain amendments, and I ask that it may be printed and recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine, from the Committee on Commerce, reports back with amendments the bill (H. The Senator from Maine asks that the bill may be printed and recommitted. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 22, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 21, 1888.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

VETO MESSAGE—THEODORA M. PIATT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, on motion of Mr. SPRINGER, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 2282, entitled "An act to pension Mrs. Theodora M. Piatt."

The deceased husband of the beneficiary named in this bill served faithfully and well in the volunteer service, and after his discharge as major entered the regular Army and was on the retired-list at the time of his death, which occurred on the 17th day of April, 1885. At that time he seems to have been engaged in the practice of the law at Covington, Ky.

He does not appear to have contracted any distinct and definite disability in his army service, though his health and strength were doubtless somewhat impaired by hardship and exposure.

It is conceded that he committed suicide by shooting himself with a pistol.

A coroner's inquest was held and the following verdict was returned:

"Benjamin M. Piatt came to his death from a pistol bullet through the brain, fired from a pistol in his own hand, with suicidal intent, while laboring under a fit of temporary insanity, caused by morbid sensitiveness of wasted opportunities, and constantly brooding over imaginary troubles and financial difficulties."

It is said in support of his widow's claim for pension that being lame, as a result, in part at least, of his military service, he, by reason of such lameness, fell from a staircase a few months before his death, the injury from which affected his mind, causing insanity, which in its turn resulted in his suicide.

Much interest is manifested in this case, based upon former friendship and intimacy with the deceased and kind feeling and sympathy for his widow. I should be glad to respond to these sentiments to the extent of approving this bill, but it is one of the misfortunes of public life and official responsibility that a sense of duty frequently stands between a conception of right and a sympathetic inclination.

The verdict returned upon the coroner's inquest, founded upon a friendly examination of all the facts surrounding the melancholy death of this soldier, made at the time of death and in the midst of his neighbors and friends, both by what it contains and by what is omitted, together with the other facts developed, lead me to the conclusion that if a pension is granted in this case no soldier's widow's application based upon suicide can be consistently rejected.

VETO MESSAGE—NANCY F. JENNINGS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. SPRINGER, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 5545, entitled "An act granting a pension to Nancy F. Jennings."

William Jennings, the husband of the beneficiary named in this bill, enlisted in October, 1861, and was discharged June 24, 1862, upon a surgeon's certificate of disability, the cause of disability being therein stated as "hemorrhoids."

He never applied for a pension, and died in 1877 of apoplexy.

In the report of the committee which reported this bill the allegation is made that the deceased came home from the army with chronic diarrhea and suffered from the same to the date of his death.

The widow filed a claim for pension in 1878, which was rejected on the ground that the fatal disease, apoplexy, was not due to military service nor the result of either of the complaints mentioned.

If we are to adhere to the rule that in order to entitle the widow of a soldier to a pension the death of her husband must be in some way related to his military service, there can be no doubt that, upon its merits, this case was properly disposed of by the Pension Bureau.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 18, 1888.

During the reading of the foregoing,

Mr. MORRILL said: Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as these several messages were laid before the House on Saturday, I ask unanimous consent that the reading be dispensed with, and that they be appropriately referred, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ADAMS. I think it would be entirely proper to have them read by their titles, at least.

Mr. NELSON. I object to dispensing with the reading.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the Clerk will proceed with the reading.

VETO MESSAGE—SALLY A. RANDALL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. SPRINGER, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 88, entitled "An act granting a pension to Sally A. Randall."

Antipas Taber enlisted in the war of 1812, and was discharged in the year 1814. There is no claim made that he received any injury in the Army or that his death, which happened long after his discharge, was in the slightest degree related to his military service. It does not appear that he ever made any application for a pension or was ever upon the pension-rolls. He died at Trinidad, in the Island of Cuba, April 11, 1831, leaving as his widow the beneficiary mentioned in this bill. About twenty-two years after his death, and in February, 1853, she married Albert Randall, and twenty years thereafter, in October, 1873, Randall died, leaving her again a widow.

It is alleged in the report of the committee in the House to which this bill was referred that Mrs. Randall is a worthy woman, seventy-five years of age, in needy circumstances, with health much impaired, and that the petition for her relief was signed by prominent citizens of Norwich, Conn., where she now resides.

All this certainly commends her case to the kindness and benevolence of the citizens mentioned, and the State of Connecticut ought not to allow her to be in needy circumstances.

It seems to me, however, that it would establish a bad precedent to provide for her from the Federal Treasury. From the statement of her present age, she must have been born during the time of her first husband's enlistment. She knew nothing of his military service except as the same may have been detailed to her. Her first widowhood had no connection with any incident or condition of health traceable to such service; and her second husband, with whom she lived for twenty years, never entered the military service of the Government.

I do not see how the relief proposed can be granted in this case without an unjustifiable departure from the rules under which applications for pension should be determined.

VETO MESSAGE—WILLIAM H. HESTER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. MATSON, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 8164, entitled "An act granting a pension to William H. Hester."

It is claimed that the beneficiary named in this bill was injured by sand blowing in his eyes during a sand-storm while in the service in the year 1869, resulting in nearly if not quite total blindness.

It is conceded in the report of the committee to which this bill was referred in the House, that the claim for pension made by this man to the Pension Bureau was largely supported by perjury and forgery; but the criminality of these methods is made to rest upon three rogues and scoundrels who undertook to obtain a pension for the soldier; and it is stated by the committee as their opinion that the claimant himself was innocent of any complicity in the crimes committed and attempted.

I have quite a full report of the papers filed and proceedings taken in relation to the claim presented to the Pension Bureau, and I am sorry that I can not agree with the committee of the House as to the merits of the application now made, or the good faith and honesty of the beneficiary named in the bill herewith returned.

Among the facts presented I shall refer to but one or two touching the conduct of the claimant himself.

Upon his examination, under oath, by a special examiner, he stated that he was brought to Washington to further his claim by a man named Miller, one of the rascally attorneys spoken of in the committee's report; that Miller was to pay his expenses while in Washington, and was to receive one-third of the money paid upon the claim.

This is not the conduct of a man claiming in good faith a pension from the Government.

He further stated under oath that his eyes became affected about January 15, 1869, by reason of a sand-storm; that the sand blew into them and cut them all to pieces; that he was thereafter hardly able to see or get around and wait on himself, and that Edward N. Baldwin took care of him in his tent.

This Mr. Baldwin was found by the special examiner, and testified that he knew the claimant and served in same regiment and bunked with him; that he never knew of the sand-storm spoken of by Hester; that he never knew that he had sore eyes in the service; that he (Baldwin) did not take care of him when he was suffering with sore eyes, and that he never knew of Hester being sick but once, and that was when he had eaten too much. He was shown an affidavit purporting to be made by him, and declared the entire thing to be false and a forgery.

I believe this claim for pension to be a fraud from beginning to end, and the effrontery with which it has been pushed shows the necessity of a careful examination of these cases.

VETO MESSAGE—ROYAL J. HIAR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. MATSON, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 879, entitled "An act granting a pension to Royal J. Hiar."

The beneficiary named in this bill enlisted November 11, 1861, in the First Regiment of Michigan Engineers and Mechanics. He is reported as absent without proper authority from May 24, 1862, to January 15, 1863, when he was discharged by reason of varicose veins of the left leg and thigh, claimed to have existed before enlistment.

He filed a claim for pension August 30, 1876, alleging disease of the right side and hip, due to typhoid pneumonia, contracted while repairing a hospital tent in March, 1862.

There is no record of this disease; the proof he furnishes of the same is extremely slight, though he was furnished ample opportunity; the disability of which he complains has no natural relation to the sickness he claims to have had during his service, but is quite a natural result of "an injury while logging," to which some of the witnesses examined in a special examination of the case attribute it.

VETO MESSAGE—CYRENIUS G. STRYKER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. MATSON, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 5234, entitled "An act granting a pension to Cyrenius G. Stryker."

The beneficiary named in this bill enlisted for nine months, in September, 1862, and was discharged June 27, 1863.

His enlistment was in Company A, Thirtieth New Jersey Regiment. The bill proposes to pension him as "a private in Company A, Thirtieth New York Volunteers."

He alleges that he was pushed or fell from the platform of a car in which he was transported to Washington after enlistment, and injured his spine. On the claim which he presented to the Pension Bureau in June, 1879, repeated medical examinations failed to reveal any disability from the cause alleged, and after a special examination his claim was rejected, because, with the assistance of such special examination, the claimant did not prove the origin of alleged injury in service and the line of duty, or a pensionable degree of disability therefrom since discharge.

The evidence now offered in support of this claim appears to have reference to a time long anterior to its rejection by the Pension Bureau in 1886, and does not impeach the finding of the bureau that at the latter date there existed no pensionable disability.

VETO MESSAGE—ELLEN SHEA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. MATSON, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 3579, entitled "An act granting a pension to Ellen Shea."

This beneficiary is an old lady and a widow. Her son, Michael Shea, enlisted in January, 1862. The records show that he was sick on one or two occasions during his service; he is also reported as a deserter and absent without leave and in arrest and confinement fully as often as he was sick. He was discharged January 20, 1865.

No application for a pension has been made on his behalf. The mother filed a claim for pension in July, 1884, alleging that her son contracted a fever in the service which resulted in insanity, which was the cause of his death on the 10th day of March, 1884.

He was killed by a snow-slide in the State of Colorado. The only hint that his death was in any way connected with the service is the suggestion that not having the proper use of his mind he wandered away and was killed.

His mother now lives in Chicago, and I suppose lived there at the time of her son's death. There is very little evidence offered of any unsoundness of mind, and his death occurring at Woodstock, Colo., it is hardly to be supposed that he wandered that far. And as tending to show that unsoundness of mind had nothing to do with his death it may be mentioned that an attorney having the mother's application for pension in charge withdrew from the case in October, 1884, for the reason that having made inquiries at the place where the soldier was killed he found that his death was caused by a snow-slide, and that he was informed that a number of other persons lost their lives at the same time.

VETO MESSAGE—SARAH E. M'CALEB.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. PLUMB, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 6609, entitled "An act for the relief of Sarah E. McCaleb."

The husband of the beneficiary named in this bill was wounded in the head at the battle of Fort Donelson on the 15th day of February, 1862. He served thereafter and was promoted, and was discharged June 30, 1865.

He died by suicide in 1878.

He never applied for a pension.

The suggestion is made that the wound in his head predisposed him to mental unsoundness, but it does not appear to be claimed that he was insane.

I can not believe that his suicide had any connection with his army service.

VETO MESSAGE—FARNAREN BALL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. MATSON, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 4590, entitled "An act granting a pension to Farnaren Ball."

In the report of the committee to which this bill was referred, the name of this beneficiary is given as "Farnasen Ball," and in a report from the Pension Bureau it is insisted that the correct name is "Tamezen Ball."

Her son, Augustus F. Coldecott, was pensioned for disease of the lungs up to the time of his death, which occurred June 2, 1872.

The cause of his death was an overdose of laudanum, and whether it was taken by mistake or design is uncertain.

The mother is not entirely destitute, deriving an income, though small, from the interest upon a mortgage given to her upon a sale of some real estate.

The proofs with which I have been furnished failed to satisfy me that the Government should grant a pension on account of death produced by a self-administered narcotic in the circumstances which surrounded this case.

As a general proposition I see nothing unjust or unfair in holding that if a pensioner is sick and through ignorance or design takes laudanum without the direction or regulation of a physician the Government should not be held responsible for the consequences.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 19, 1888.

VETO MESSAGE—IMPROVEMENT CASTLE ISLAND, BOSTON HARBOR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval a joint resolution which originated in the House of Representatives "authorizing the use and improvement of Castle Island, in Boston Harbor."

This island is separated from the mainland of the city of Boston by a channel over one-half mile wide. Fort Independence is located on the island, and it is regarded by our military authorities as quite important to the defense of the city.

The proposition contained in the joint resolution is to permit the city of Boston, through its park commissioners, to improve and beautify this island in connection with a public park to be laid out in the city, with the intention of joining the mainland and the island by the construction of a viaduct or causeway across the water now separating the same.

It is quite plain that the occupancy of this island as a place of pleasure and recreation as contemplated under this resolution would be entirely inconsistent with military or defensive uses. I do not regard the control reserved in the resolution to the Secretary of War over such excavations, fillings, and structures upon the island as may be proposed as of much importance. When a park is established there the island is no longer a defense in time of need.

This scheme, or one of the same character, was broached more than four years ago, and met the disapproval of the Secretary of War and the Engineer Department.

I am now advised by the Secretary of War, the Chief of Engineers, and the Lieutenant-General of the Army, in quite positive terms, that the resolution under consideration should not, for reasons fully stated by them, become operative.

I deem the opinions of these officers abundant justification for my disapproval of the resolution without further statement of objections.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 18, 1888.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not advised as to what committee reported this joint resolution.

Mr. COX. It comes from the Committee on Military Affairs.

from justice in the Indian Territory, with amendments by the Senate, and a request by the Senate for a committee of conference.

Mr. ROGERS. This is a House bill which passed the House without any sort of opposition. One or two verbal amendments have been put on it by the Senate. They do not change the bill in the slightest degree, except to make it a little more specific. I ask that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, after the word "process," in line 3, insert "connected with any criminal proceeding."

On page 1, lines 7 and 8, strike out "$79,000,000" and insert "$80,473,000."

On page 1, strike out all after "further," in line 11, down to and including "husband," in line 12, and insert "that all pensions which have been or may hereafter be granted under the general laws regulating pensions to widows in consequence of death occurring from a cause which originated in the service since the 4th day of March, 1861, shall commence from the date of the death of the husband."

On page 2, line 19, strike out "fifteen" and insert "eighteen."

On page 2, line 21, after "Treasury," insert "where practicable."

On page 2, line 24, strike out all after "respectively" to the end of the bill.

Mr. FORAN. I ask unanimous consent that the House non-concur in the Senate amendments, and ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. McMILLIN. What is the object of the bill?

Mr. DOCKERY. The object is to punish the crime of forgery by clerks, and other postal crimes.

Mr. NELSON. I call for the reading of the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, at end of line 21, insert: "And all matter otherwise mailable by law upon the envelope or outside cover or wrapper of which, or postal-card upon which, indecent, lewd, lascivious, obscene, libelous, scurrilous, or threatening delineations, epithets, terms, or language, or reflecting injuriously upon the character or conduct of another, may be written or printed are hereby declared to be non-mailable matter and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post-office, nor delivered by any letter-carrier. I therefore ask for the unanimous consideration of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. NEAL], that the bill be now considered?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Let the report be read.

The SPEAKER. There is no report. This is a Senate bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Then let the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. NEAL] make a statement.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, as I have already said——

ALASKA SEAL-FUR FISHERIES.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the resolution I send to the desk, and that the same be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries be authorized and directed to fully and thoroughly investigate the fur-seal fisheries of Alaska, and all contracts or leases made by the Government with any persons or companies for the taking of fur-seals or other fur-bearing animals in Alaska; the character, duration, and conditions of such contracts or leases, and whether and to what extent the same have been enforced and complied with or violated; the receipts therefrom and the expenses incurred by the Government on account of any such contracts or leases; and to fully investigate and report upon the nature and extent of the rights and interests of the United States in the fur-seal and other fisheries in the Bering Sea, in Alaska; whether and to what extent the same have been violated, and by whom; and what, if any, legislation is necessary for the better protection and preservation of the same; that said committee be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House, send for persons and papers, and administer oaths, employ a messenger if found necessary, and that all expenses of such investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. DUNN. The committee recommend an amendment by inserting, after the words "Merchant Marine and Fisheries," the words "or a subcommittee thereof."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BLOUNT. I think we had better go on with the regular order of business.

Mr. DUNN. This is a unanimous report from the committee.

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will not object.

Mr. BLOUNT. I was in hopes the House would go on with appropriation bills to-day.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia object?

Mr. DUNN. This will take but a moment.

Mr. BLOUNT. If it leads to no debate I shall not interpose an objection.

Mr. DUNN. There will be no debate.

Mr. Speaker, there are several verbal amendments in the body of the resolution as reported by the committee and read by the Clerk which I ask to be adopted, as well as the amendment I have just suggested providing for the subcommittee.

The amendments were adopted.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the resolution whether there is any limit to the expenditure it provides. I was not able to hear distinctly the reading of the resolution.

Mr. FELTON. There is no limit.

Mr. DUNN. There is not, and in view of the fact that the investigation proposed by the resolution will take place here, it is not probable that there will be any considerable expenditure.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But how many witnesses will traveling expenses from Alaska have to be provided for?

Mr. DUNN. It is impossible to tell the gentleman how many witnesses there will be, or where they will come from. I can not give him any information on that point.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I think there ought to be some limit.

Mr. RANDALL. Does this provide for stenographers?

Mr. DUNN. No, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. It proposes to use the stenographers appointed for committees?

Mr. DUNN. Yes, sir.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. DUNN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON LABOR.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to submit a resolution recommended by the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That to-morrow, Tuesday, May 22, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be, and the same is hereby, set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Labor, in such order as said committee may indicate.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. MILLS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CORRECTION.

Mr. DALZELL rose.

Mr. BLOUNT. I call for the regular order.

Mr. DALZELL. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DALZELL. I desire to call the attention of the House to certain errors in the RECORD of last Thursday morning. On Wednesday of last week I made some observations with respect to a certain essay read by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] on the previous Friday, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania undertook to reply. During the course of that reply a colloquy ensued between the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM], and myself.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. I can not hear a word the gentleman from Pennsylvania says.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has endeavored to secure order. Gentlemen will take their seats and stop conversation.

Mr. DALZELL. I repeat that during the discussion a colloquy took place, in which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM], and myself took part. I find on an examination of the proceedings as reported in the RECORD of Thursday morning, that the report of the transaction has been very materially altered, in two ways. It is altered first by the suppression of that which actually took place in the House, and it is altered in the second place by the insertion in the RECORD of what did not take place in the House. These omissions and these insertions are both, in my judgment, material to the discussion. They both relate to a subject-matter in which not only the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], but the other gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM], and myself are interested.

Now, while I concede in the fullest and most generous way the right of any member to revise his remarks, I suggest that the rules of the House and the rules of common fairness and common sense do not carry that liberty to revise remarks so as to include those in which other parties than the reviser are interested, and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had no right to so alter this colloquy as to place my colleague [Mr. BRUMM] or myself in an attitude which we did not occupy, and to place himself in an attitude which he did not occupy in the debate of the previous day. I found, upon an examination at the office of the Public Printer, that the record sent to the gentleman from Pennsylvania of the day's transactions had not been returned with the exception of one or two pages, but something prepared by the gentleman himself had been substituted in lieu thereof. I therefore applied to the Official Reporter for a transcript of his stenographic notes, and received from him yesterday this letter:

HOUSE, May 19, 1888.

DEAR SIR: I inclose copy you requested, giving exact report of Mr. SCOTT's remarks.

Very truly,

J. J. McELHONE,
Chief Corps Official Reporters.

Hon. JOHN DALZELL, Arlington, City.

I shall send to the Clerk's desk and have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks what Mr. McElhone, the Chief Reporter, characterizes as an "exact report of Mr. SCOTT's remarks."

That exact report, as it ought to have appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Thursday last, is as follows:

Mr. SCOTT. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the personal attack upon myself by the gentleman—I will call him so, although I may be mistaken in that.

A MEMBER. I guess not.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not know, sir, if he is speaking in the interest of the American people and his direct constituency, or whether he is here as an attorney in the interest of certain interests in this country. I will leave him, sir, to decide that question for himself. But I will tell the gentleman one thing, that if he will go to Scott Haven, which he refers to, he will find two thousand men who triweekly receive their cash at a dollar a day more than the gentleman's friends pay or the Carnegie Steel Works pay. [Applause.]

I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as he is a constitutional lawyer and I am not, whether he has ever heard of the case of the Thomson estate?

Mr. DALZELL. Against whom?

Mr. SCOTT. It is his case, and I will just briefly refer to it. Why did not the gentleman stand up in his seat, and while he was defending the Edgar Thomson Steel Works, why did he not refer to the Pennsylvania Steel-Works and the Johnstown Steel-Works?

But I am stating here facts brought up in a court of justice, and I will very briefly say what this case shows in the way of the profits by protection to home industries, and I hope the gentleman will give me his attention.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh! I know all about that case.

Mr. SCOTT. I paid very close attention to what the gentleman said.

Mr. DALZELL. I am giving you attention.

Mr. SCOTT. I will ask the Clerk simply to read what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"At the auditing of the account of the trustees of the estate of Edgar Thomson, the decedent, the following facts appeared:

"The testator at his death owned one thousand shares of stock of the Pennsylvania Steel Company. This company being in need of funds, the stock at the time having been somewhat depressed, sold to the Pennsylvania Railway Company six thousand shares, and used the proceeds to improve its plant and carry on a larger business, which proved very remunerative, and in December, 1881, the directors of the Pennsylvania Steel Company authorized their president to repurchase of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company five thousand shares at $265 a share; which was accordingly done and duly paid for. At the purchase it was stipulated that the Pennsylvania Steel Company should immediately offer to its shareholders to take their pro rata proportion of these five thousand shares at par, and that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company should also take and pay for the shares which might be allotted to it on the remaining one thousand shares which had not been resold to the Pennsylvania Steel Company.

"On the same day a communication marked 'confidential' was sent to each stockholder of the Pennsylvania Steel Company, citing the facts and offering to apportion these shares pro rata and at par among the stockholders of the company. The rate for fractional shares was fixed at $200 a share. At the time of this purchase the undivided profits of the Pennsylvania Steel Company amounted to $3,286,423.51. The net cost to the company of the purchase was $825,000, leaving a surplus of profits which amounted to $2,461,423.51."

Mr. SCOTT. That is enough. Now, sir, I did not refer to but one steel industry in my State, and I offer that quotation in evidence in this House to show what one other company had. With a capital stock of $2,000,000, a surplus of $3,600,000, and that accumulated when the iron industries of the country were depressed. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania get up here and say that he believes Carnegie & Co., in forcing their men by Pinkerton's detectives to go back at 10 per cent. less than the wages paid, can be justified? Does he justify it?

Mr. DALZELL. Do you want me to answer the question?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, I want you to answer it.

Mr. DALZELL. There are two answers. The first is, that you are trying to divert this House from the subject that I discussed, and which I would like you to meet. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SCOTT. Oh, answer the question. Do not try to evade it.

Mr. DALZELL. And this is the second, that the statement that the Edgar Thomson people compelled their employés to go back by detectives is untrue in fact.

Mr. SCOTT. I did not state that, but I stated that they covered their works with Pinkerton detectives and then hired foreign labor to come there and drive their men out. And you are standing here to-day professing to represent an enlightened constituency, and yet advocate the man who would be guilty of such an act as that. [Renewed applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL rose.

Mr. SCOTT. No; just let me proceed now.

Mr. DALZELL. But do you not want me to answer your question?

Mr. SCOTT. I say to the gentleman that he has mistaken his calling.

Mr. DALZELL. That may be; but do you not want me to reply?

Mr. SCOTT. I do; but I have but five minutes left. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Then you ought not to ask any questions.

Mr. BRUMM. We will give an extension of your time.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Will the statesman from Erie allow a question right at this point?

Mr. SCOTT. No, sir; you are a general interrupter, and I will not yield to your questions. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I admire the patriotism of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in the interest of those he represents. But I would like to know how many days' labor he ever furnished to the wage-worker of this country. I would like to know when the week came around how many men have ever been on his pay-rolls.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, I am not a millionaire, and do not pretend to be. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SCOTT. Oh, you are not. You have had the opportunity of being a millionaire, but you have not had the brains to get there. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, no, I had not the opportunity.

Mr. SCOTT. It is just such gentlemen as the member from Pennsylvania whom the Constitution and the laws of this country are intended to protect and whom we are all endeavoring to protect to enable all, whatever their abilities may be, to get an honest living.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, I can take care of myself.

Mr. SCOTT. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has not denied, or at least he has not submitted any figures or facts denying the statement I made that $4.09 was the total amount that labor received in the production of a ton of steel rails.

Mr. DALZELL. Why, certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. I can prove right here that what you say is not true.

Mr. DALZELL. Now will the statesman from Erie allow me just a minute?

Mr. SCOTT. No, sir. Here is a contract under seal, as awarded by the board of arbitration of the Knights of Labor between the Edgar Thomson Steel Works and their employés, specifying the name of every employé, number of men employed, the work they were to do, and the percentage each man was to get. I will further state to the gentleman that if the gentleman will get up on this floor and offer a resolution appointing a select committee to go to the Edgar Thomson Steel Works and ascertain from them what they pay for their labor or what it costs to produce a ton of steel rails, I will open every book I have, every balance-sheet I have. I will take them up to Scott Haven and compare the wage-workers of Scott Haven with those of the industries which the gentleman here is pleading for, and I will abide by the report of that committee, and a majority of it may be gentlemen on the other side if they are only honest and square men.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman include also his anthracite miners?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, the anthracite miners, too.

Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that a question so important as this to the whole country could have been discussed on this floor without personal attacks upon any gentleman. I made no personal charges against the proprietors of the Edgar Thomson Steel-Works. I merely stated facts in connection with that industry, and I merely stated what the senior member of that firm had admitted to me in the Committee on Ways and Means, that he had drawn this amount of money which I stated he had drawn, and I made certain illustrations in connection with it. But it appeared to have stuck in the heart of the gentleman who has just preceded me, and in answer to my arguments, and in answer to my facts he comes here and makes a personal attack upon me. I can say to him, sir, that I mind it no more than I would the barking of a dog in the street. [Applause on the Democratic side and derisive laughter on the Republican side.]

I will stand upon my record at home and with my people. And if I have ever been the oppressor of labor, if I have ever ejected a man from his home, if I have ever endeavored in my life, although I have been, I may say, a large employer of labor, to put one laborer in the place of another, or to force one man in the place of another; if I have employed a detective—not a Pinkerton detective, merely, but any other kind of a detective—to come and protect my property or to protect it against the men that are working for me, or have worked for me, I, sir, will resign my seat and leave this Hall the day it is proved.

Mr. BRUMM. Does the gentleman not contribute to pay the coal and iron police?

Mr. SCOTT. I never so contributed. I know you made that statement on this floor.

Mr. BRUMM. And I will prove it.

Mr. SCOTT. I will make you prove it. I am going to bring you before the bar of the House and make you prove that charge.

Mr. BRUMM. All right; I will be there.

Mr. SCOTT. It is as false as hell itself, and the gentleman when he made the charge ought to have known what he was doing.

Now, I have nothing more to say. I have been identified with the laborers of this country all my life; I have worked and toiled with them; and when I start out to rob anybody or to get anybody's money it will not be the money of the wage-worker of this country. [Applause.]

I desire now to call the attention of the House to one or two features in which the RECORD does not furnish a true statement of the transactions of Wednesday, in so far as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] and myself were interested. Upon page 4501 of the RECORD I find the following:

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, yesterday evening I received a letter by special messenger from the member from Pennsylvania who has just taken his seat, as follows:

"HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Washington, May 15, 1888.

"DEAR SIR: Some time during the session to-morrow, probably in the afternoon, I propose to make some observations with respect to your speech of Friday last. I think you will probably be interested, and hope you may be present.

"Yours, truly,

"JOHN DALZELL.

"Hon. W. L. SCOTT."

A letter so courteous, Mr. Chairman, could not but receive that consideration to which it seemed to be entitled. I have therefore, sir, remained here all day waiting until the member from Pennsylvania might have an opportunity to explain to this House and the country wherein, as has been whispered about, I was mistaken in the facts presented in my speech of Friday last. Sir, I expected the gentleman, as the special representative of the trust interests of this country, to come here prepared at least to say something in rebuttal of the facts I have presented. With those interests, representing $20,000,000, at his back to supply him with the data necessary to refute my statements, with five days to prepare a carefully written speech which he has just delivered, with time unlimited in which to deliver it, I have waited here until this late hour expecting to hear the statements I have made controverted, or at least denied. But, sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania confines himself to the subject only in a criticism of my historical allusions and ridiculing my illustration of the Braddock farmer. There he stops and devotes the remainder of his speech to a personal vilification of myself.

Mr. Speaker, not one word nor one syllable of this was spoken by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in this House on Wednesday, and the RECORD, so far as that is concerned, incorrectly undertakes to record the transactions of Wednesday. Now, Mr. Speaker, what the gentleman actually did say I propose to read:

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the personal attack upon myself of the gentleman—I will call him so, although I may be mistaken in that——

A MEMBER. I guess not.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not know, sir, whether he is speaking in the interest of the American people and his direct constituency, or whether he is here as an attorney in the interest of certain interests in this country. I will leave him, sir, to decide that question for himself.

But I will tell the gentleman one thing: that if he will go to Scott Haven, which he refers to, he will find two thousand men who tri-weekly receive their cash at a dollar a day more than the gentleman's friends pay or the Carnegie Steel Works pay. [Applause.]

I desire to call the attention of the House now to the material differences between these two records of what took place on Wednesday last. The printed RECORD omits the assertion upon the part of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] that he pays his men at Scott Haven in cash and tri-weekly, and I am unwilling that the gentleman's assertion made in this House and to the country upon that subject shall not stand as made by him. In the actual transaction as it occurred on this floor, it will be observed that the gentleman from Pennsylvania hesitated, even in the heat of debate, to impute to me a position and character upon this floor different from that which I am presumed to occupy. What he said was this:

I do not know, sir, whether he is speaking in the interest of the American people and his direct constituency, or whether he is here as an attorney in the interest of certain interests in this country. I will leave him, sir, to decide that question for himself.

Let me repeat that in the heat of debate the gentleman shrank from assigning to me a position and character different from what I am presumed to occupy in this House, but in the deliberation of his closet he made himself say:

I expected the gentleman, as the special representative of the trust interests of this country, to come here prepared, etc.

Now, sir, I make simply one comment upon that. It is not creditable to the gentleman that he assumed in the heat of debate a more manly position than he did when he undertook to sit down in his room and make for the country an imaginary record of what took place in the House on that day, and the charge that he makes—if he makes it as a charge—is untrue, as I believe I need hardly say in this House.

With respect to the minor errors which are the result of this process of cutting and filling and suppressing and creating, I pass them over. They will be apparent to members of the House upon reading the RECORD. I want simply to call the attention of the House to one or two other matters that seem to me to be material in view of the attitude assumed by the gentleman [Mr. SCOTT] in his speech on Friday. During the course of the colloquy Mr. BRUMM asked: "Does the gentleman not contribute to pay the coal and iron police?" The answer of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] was:

I never so contributed. I know you made that statement on this floor.

Mr. BRUMM. I will prove it.

Mr. SCOTT. I will make you prove it. I am going to bring you before the bar of this House and make you prove that charge.

In the RECORD, as contributed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], the colloquy reads this way:

Mr. BRUMM. Does the gentleman not contribute to pay the coal and iron police?

Mr. SCOTT. I never so contributed. I know you made a statement on this floor that I had employed Pinkerton detectives, which is false, "etc."

Now, the House will observe and the country will observe that on this floor on Wednesday last the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] denied point-blank that he ever contributed to the payment of coal and iron police, and said that the statement made on the floor of the House by my colleague, Mr. BRUMM, that he had so contributed, was false; but the record as the gentleman returns it to the Public Printer suppresses that denial and puts it in this way:

I know you made a statement on this floor that I had employed Pinkerton detectives, which is false.

I simply call the attention of the House and the country to this point now, so that the gentleman's statement made on Wednesday last may perhaps at some future time be put to the test of proof.

One other correction only and I have done. According to the record as furnished by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] he said this:

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's argument in regard to my employing a $10,000 cook has the same foundation for truth that some of his other statements have, and if such were the fact, sir, I could only compare the wages paid my cook with the wages paid by his clients at the Edgar Thomson Steel Works. As to the salaries paid my secretaries, or at least those who assist me in my business, if he refers to the men in my employ, I can tell him that there are a good many of them who get more than $5,000 a year.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] never uttered any such words in this House, nor anything like them. What he did say is this: "It is as false as hell itself, and the gentleman when he made the charge ought to have known what he was doing."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have nothing more to say than to repeat what I said at the outset, that while I concede the right of every member of this House to revise his remarks, I deny his right to put that into the RECORD which did not occur or to take that out which did occur, when the omissions and the interjections affect the interests and rights of another member, without the consent of that member.

Mr. SCOTT. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SCOTT. I wish to inquire whether the remarks just made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the matters he has had read will go into the RECORD of to-day?

The SPEAKER. They will.

Mr. SCOTT. Then I have very little to say on this subject. I wish simply to refer to one fact. One of the strong points made by the gentleman in regard to my statement of fact was in connection with his colleague [Mr. BRUMM]. During my absence from the House of Representatives the member from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] made the charge——

Mr. DALZELL. I suggest to the gentleman that Mr. BRUMM is now absent.

Mr. SCOTT. I can not help it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. He ought to be here.

Mr. SCOTT. I was not here when Mr. BRUMM made this charge against me.

Mr. REED. The question before the House at present, I understand, is in regard to changing the RECORD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] now rises to a question of personal privilege in the absence of Mr. BRUMM.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to do so.

Mr. REED. He can not do it as a reply to the matter which has been raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. HATCH. The gentleman from Pennsylvania who has just taken his seat [Mr. DALZELL] all through his statement brought the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] into this colloquy.

Mr. REED. Solely with reference to changing the RECORD.

Mr. HATCH. He quoted the language of Mr. BRUMM and the language of Mr. SCOTT in reply.

Mr. REED. All right.

Mr. HATCH. This is only a specimen of the subterfuges that gentlemen on that side get up.

Mr. DALZELL. I have no objection at all to the gentleman from Pennsylvania going on.

Mr. SCOTT. Have I the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the floor.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask to have read as a part of my remarks a part of the proceedings of this House as taken down at the time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BRUMM. Is it not true that the very men who employed the Pinkerton men in all those coal strikes are free-traders, headed by Mr. SCOTT, of this House; Mr. Corbin, of New York, and Mr. Cox, of Pennsylvania—all free-traders?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Does the gentleman charge that Mr. SCOTT has done so? Do you [Mr. BRUMM] assume to say that he has?

Mr. BRUMM. I assume to say that he has, and am responsible for it, and am ready to show it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. He says it is not true.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Corbin and Mr. Cox, are leaders of Democratic free trade.

Mr. SCOTT. Now, Mr. Speaker, that was the utterance of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] during my absence from the House, but the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the next morning did not show one word of what has just been read. But, sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania who uttered that took occasion to see that it was sent out in the public press of this country, charging me with engaging Pinkerton's detectives and being in alliance with Mr. Corbin and other gentlemen from Pennsylvania whom I have never seen and do not know. And the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] now gets up in defense of the charges he makes against me and tries to show that I have been misrepresenting Mr. BRUMM as to the charge he made against me. At the time that he fell from the Pinkerton police he dropped into the local police. I send to the desk and ask to have read a telegram received by me from the superintendent of the mines in Mr. BRUMM's district. This telegram is sent in reply to an inquiry of mine, "Have you ever employed a Pinkerton detective?"

The Clerk read as follows:

SHAMOKIN, PA., May 10, 1888.

W. L. SCOTT, Washington:

No, sir, never had any occasion to employ detectives.

HOLDEN CHESTER.

Mr. SCOTT. Now, sir, that is all I have to say in regard to this question. If the gentleman [Mr. DALZELL] is satisfied with what he stated, and is willing for this whole thing to go before the country in the condition in which he has put it, it is perfectly agreeable to me; and I will not detain the House by discussing it further.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Who is Holden Chester, who signs that telegram?

Mr. SCOTT. He is my superintendent at the mines in Mr. BRUMM's district.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, with respect to the merits of this matter, if the gentleman is now introducing that subject into the House, I will say that I do not intend to be precluded from the discussion of that question by making no reply at this time. I simply refrain for the reason that the remarks of the gentleman just made seem to apply to my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM], who is able, as I conceive, to take care of himself.

Upon the other question, the question involved in that telegram sent up, as to the employment of detectives and all that sort of thing, I have on my table evidence sufficient, if read, to occupy the attention of the House all day; but I abstain.

A MEMBER. What does that evidence go to show?

Mr. DALZELL. It goes to show the attitude of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] with respect to the question of evictions at his works, with respect to the question of "pluck-me" stores, with respect to the question of employment of detectives, with respect to the question of paying as good wages as anybody else. I say with regard to all these questions, if the House had time to go into them on the merits, as I think it has not now, I have evidence on my table sufficient to occupy the attention of the House all day against the statements made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I refrain from offering it now simply because I take it that the statements just made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] have relation to my colleague [Mr. BRUMM], and not to anything that I have said. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. KERR. I wish simply to say as a matter of privilege that the day before yesterday Mr. BRUMM asked me to have him excused on account of important business; and for that reason he is now absent.

VISITORS TO WEST POINT MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. STEELE. Having been appointed one of the Board of Visitors to the Military Academy at West Point I ask to be excused on account of important business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is excused, and during the day the Chair will make an appointment to fill the vacancy.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the first business in order is the call of States and Territories for the introduction and reference of bills and resolutions.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask by unanimous consent to dispense with the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions, and that members having bills and joint resolutions and memorials to present can do so by handing them in at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HATCH. We will get the House into confusion as to the reference of bills and joint resolutions, and I therefore object.

Mr. BLOUNT. It has been done heretofore.

Mr. HATCH. I think never has it been done.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes; it has been done, and done within a month.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, in the year 1888.

Resolution relative to the immigration and importation into the United States of convicts, lunatics, idiots, and other persons liable to become a public charge.

Whereas his excellency the governor, in a message to the senate and house of representatives, for good and sufficient reasons has requested that Congress be memorialized for a modification of existing laws which will more effectually prevent the immigration and importation into the United States of convicts, lunatics, idiots, and other persons liable to become a public charge:

Resolved, That the accompanying memorial, addressed to the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, be signed by the president of the senate and speaker of the house of representatives, and that the secretary of the commonwealth is hereby instructed to transmit copies to the presiding officers of both Houses of Congress, to the Senators and Members of Congress from this Commonwealth, and to the governors of the several States of the Republic.

IN SENATE, April 20, 1888.

Adopted. Sent down for concurrence.

E. HERBERT CLAPP, Clerk.

IN HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 26, 1888.

Adopted in concurrence.

EDWARD A. MCLAUGHLIN, Clerk.

Memorial.

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The senate and house of representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in general court assembled, present this memorial:

The act of Congress, regulating immigration, passed 1882 and amended 1884, forbids the landing of convicts, lunatics, idiots or any other person liable to become a public charge, and provides for the return of all convicts arriving at any port of the United States, except those convicted of political offenses, to the countries from which they came.

From testimony submitted to a committee of this Legislature it is evident that, notwithstanding these enactments, convicts are released from penal institutions in Great Britain and Germany before the expiration of their terms of sentence, upon the condition of their accepting a passage ticket to this country or to Canada; that persons who have received relief from public charity, or who are likely to ask for such relief, are also sent to this country; that a few, through the vigilance of the immigration officers, are detected and returned; but that by falsehood, subterfuge, assistance of interested parties, and by being in possession of prepaid tickets to some interior town or city, large numbers succeed in evading the law, especially when the immigrant is accompanied by a relative or volunteer friend who has once been in the United States, and who is ready to vouch for the good character and the ability of the immigrant to earn a livelihood.

It is plain that any examination, conducted with the utmost vigilance on the part of the immigration officer, of one thousand or more passengers at the gangway of a steam-ship, at the best, can only be superficial, and that convicts, who by their vocation of crime have habituated themselves to evade the law and deceive detectives, in many instances are able to effect a landing.

It is an indisputable and well established fact that convicts are not only released from prison, but that they are transported to this country either at the expense of foreign governments or by associations acting in concert with the officials, who, in disregard of international comity, violate the laws of the United States, thus imposing their burdens upon the people of this country—a procedure which should awaken the just indignation of every American citizen, and which calls for remedial legislation.

The reports of the public institutions of this Commonwealth show a marked disproportion between the native and foreign born inmates—the foreign born receiving public charity being 60 per cent., a very large proportion of whom have arrived in this country at a comparatively recent date. In other States, especially those that have received large accessions from Great Britain, the increase of foreign born in the charitable institutions is equally disproportionate to the native born.

In one of the reputable literary reviews for the month of March, 1888, it is stated that nearly every pauper from Great Britain was assisted to this country either by governmental aid or by so-called philanthropic associations.

The transportation of the improvident and thriftless classes to other countries is openly advocated as a measure of philanthropy in an article published in a reputable literary review in London, January, 1888:

"There is no wider field of work for the philanthropist than this: let each benevolent person take up one thriftless family as a special charge, and assist emigration. Care must be taken to provide a friend on the other side, for the thriftless do not lose their thriftlessness on the voyage, and a good start in the new home is invaluable."

In 1882, and again in 1883, by acts of Parliament, $1,000,000 was appropriated to assist emigration from Great Britain; coincident with that legislation, and with assistance by philanthropic effort in that country, is a marked increase in the disproportion between those of native and foreign birth in the prisons, almshouses, and asylums for the insane throughout the United States.

Of paupers in the almshouses of the United States in 1880, there was 1 in 981 of the native-born inhabitants to 1 in 291 of the foreign-born. Of the criminals in prisons and workhouses, there was 1 in 938 of the native-born inhabitants of the country to 1 in 518 of foreign birth. Of the inmates of insane asylums there was 1 in 662 of the native-born population to 1 in 254 of the foreign-born.

From an examination of the reports of the public institutions in several of the States, the evidence seems to be conclusive that the disproportion between the native and foreign born inmates of those institutions is much greater than that reported by the census of 1880.

To the end, therefore, that the people of this Republic may be protected from the evils and burdens resulting from the importation of convicts, paupers, idiots, insane, and the thriftless of other countries, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, with this memorial, asks for such amendment of existing laws as shall effectually exclude these classes of immigrants.

R. 10063) to authorize the Paris, Choctaw and Little Rock Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Red River at or near Hook's Ferry, Red River County, Texas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. CULBERSON (by request) also introduced a bill (H. R. 10064) to reorganize the Court of Claims, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, MARTINSVILLE, VA.

Mr. JOHN R. BROWN, of Virginia, introduced a bill (H. R. 10065) for the erection of a public building for the use of the internal-revenue and post-office at Martinsville, Va.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular call being now completed, the Chair will recognize gentlemen who were not in their seats when their States were called.

ARREARAGES OF PENSIONS, ETC.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Whereas the Committee on Invalid Pensions of this House has reported House bill 9961 by Report No. 2120, entitled "A bill relating to the arrears of pensions," with the recommendation that it do pass; and

Whereas said committee in said report estimate that said bill, if passed, will cause the expenditure of $250,000,000; and

Whereas all political parties profess to be in favor of granting to the Union soldiers of 1861 to 1865 liberal pensions for services rendered: and

Whereas on the 9th day of January House bill No. 3345, granting a pension to all such soldiers, was referred to said committee; and

Whereas it is important that said several propositions should be disposed of before any bill is passed materially reducing the revenues of the country: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of said House bill No. 3345, and that said bill and said bill No. 9961, reported by said committee, be made a special order for Friday, the 25th day of May, and that the consideration thereof shall continue from day to day until they are disposed of.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that resolution be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not entertain that request pending this call.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Not by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not. The Chair is simply continuing the call of States and Territories for bills and resolutions for reference under the rules of the House.

MANAGER OF SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. DALZELL submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Whereas the time of General James S. Negley is about to expire as a manager of the Soldiers' Home and a vacancy will be created in said board requiring a new appointment to be made: Now

Resolved, That the said General James S. Negley shall be selected for appointment as a member of said board and shall serve as his own successor thereon for the time as fixed by law.

COMPENSATION OF FOURTH-CLASS POSTMASTERS.

Mr. MONTGOMERY introduced a bill (H. R. 10066) to increase the compensation of fourth-class postmasters; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BELMONT. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York what general appropriation bill he proposes to call up?

Mr. BELMONT. My purpose is to reach the first bill on the Calendar in Committee of the Whole; that is to say, the bill making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the Government.

Mr. HATCH. I am instructed by the Committee on Agriculture to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. There is a motion now pending. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT] has moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider general appropriation bills. While that is pending the Chair can not entertain another motion.

Mr. HATCH. I desire to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HATCH. If the House should vote down the motion of the gentleman from New York, then is not the regular order the call of committees to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the situation exactly. On the last Monday for motions to suspend the rules, the first of the month, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] was recognized, and moved to suspend the rules and pass a bill which was read. A second being demanded and a vote taken, no quorum appeared, and the House thereupon adjourned. If the House shall now disagree to the motion of the gentlemen from New York [Mr. BELMONT], the first question will be on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], and after that is disposed of committees will be called for motions to suspend the rules.

Mr. HATCH. I desire to state that the Committee on Agriculture is the first on call.

Mr. RANDALL. If debate is in order I want to answer that.

Mr. BELMONT. I should like to answer it too.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT].

The question being put, there were—ayes 80, noes 77.

Mr. HATCH. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 61 members voting therefor.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 90, nays 155, not voting 79; as follows:

CONFERENCE COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 7052) relating to postal crimes and amendatory of statutes therein mentioned, Mr. DOCKERY, Mr. ERMENTROUT, and Mr. PETERS.

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH CROW INDIAN RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the pending motion to suspend the rules, made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], coming over from last suspension day.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to make an objection to the consideration of that bill, and, if the Chair will allow me, I will briefly state the ground of my objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. NELSON. The bill involved in this motion, Mr. Speaker, is a bill reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, and is on the Calendar. On last suspension day, being the first Monday in this month, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], who is not a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, moved to bring that bill up for consideration under a suspension of the rules. Now, Mr. Speaker, under the rules of the House the first Monday of every month is given to motions to suspend the rules brought up by individual members recognized by the Speaker, and the third Monday of the month is given to propositions brought up on the motions of committees or some member of the committee.

This is the day designated by the rules for bills to be brought forward by members of committees, and my contention is that this being a bill brought up not on behalf of any member of the committee or on behalf of the committee, but by an individual member, and belonging, as I contend, to individual suspension day, it is not the pending proposition to-day, but will be the pending proposition on the first Monday of next month, namely, the next individual suspension day. To hold the contrary to that would violate the spirit and tenor of the rules. Certain days are set apart under the rules for certain kinds of business to be brought up by members. Under our rules we have the first Monday of the month assigned for individual suspensions, and I suggest that a matter like this bill, coming properly under that class, can only be considered in order when the next day for that class of business, namely, the next individual suspension day, arrives. In other words, my contention is briefly this: That this proposition, brought up as it was on last individual suspension day, ought to go over until next individual suspension day, and ought not to be taken up to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had occasion to examine and decide this question in the Forty-eighth Congress. The rule provides that it shall be in order on the first Monday and the third Monday in each month to move to suspend the rules, preference being given—that is the language of the rule—to individuals on the first Monday and to committees on the third Monday. Another rule, and the universal practice of the House, is that business unfinished at the time of an adjournment is resumed when that class of business next comes up for consideration. Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], although not a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, had a right under the rules and practice of the House to select any bill he chose, and move, as an individual member, to suspend the rules and pass it. He made that motion with reference to this bill, and when the House adjourned that business was pending. The House this morning resumes the consideration of that class of business to which the gentleman's motion belongs, to wit, suspensions of the rules, and it can make no difference whether the motion is made by an individual or by the authority of the committee. It is the class of business which regulates the matter, and that, as the Chair has just said, is suspensions of the rules, and there can not be two motions to suspend the rules pending at the same time; the one pending must be disposed of before another one can be entertained by the Chair. The Chair therefore thinks the point of order is not well taken, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] and the gentleman from Montana [Mr. TOOLE] appointed to act as tellers will please resume their places.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, if I have been correctly informed, I understand the gentleman from Montana [Mr. TOOLE] is willing to withdraw his demand for a second——

Mr. TOOLE. I am willing to consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. If there be no further objection a second will be considered as ordered. Under the rules of the House thirty minutes are allowed for debate, fifteen minutes in support of the motion and fifteen minutes in opposition to it. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] to control the time in support of the motion, and the gentleman from Montana [Mr. TOOLE] to control the time in opposition to it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, it has always been the policy of Congress with reference to the construction of railroads over the public domain to be not only liberal, but positive in its action against monopoly, and so general has been this legislation that the act of March 3, 1875, grants to any company desiring to build a railroad a right of way through the public domain. That is the general policy of Congress in its legislative action upon this subject; but when it comes to the reservation of the Indian it has been the rule that special acts shall be passed by Congress, in order that its watchful care should surround the Indians in their needs and in their rights.

Built upon that, sir, has been the rule followed, I think, with rarely if ever an exception, that when the Indians in their rights are protected, when their consent has been given to the construction of a road through their reservation, Congress has invariably, following its general policy of the development of the public domain, granted and conceded the right of way. It is under this record of legislation, it is under this record of general policy, that this bill asks the right of way for 40 miles through the Crow reservation for the construction of a railroad running in its length of 120 miles through the Territories of Wyoming and Montana.

This bill follows in every part the well-defined laws of protection to the Indians as well as the exaction of obligation and fidelity on the part of those to whom the right of way will be given for the construction of the road within the recognized reasonable limit of two years. This bill follows the old bills always passed in such cases by this House. It makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to fix the amount of the compensation to be paid the Indians for such right of way and material. It leaves it with the President of the United States in his discretion to require the consent of the Indians to said right of way, "which shall be obtained by said railway company in such manner as he may prescribe before any right under this act shall accrue to said company."

It goes further and declares—

That said company shall not assign or transfer or mortgage this right of way for any purpose whatever until said road shall be completed.

It is further provided—

That no part of said line shall touch any portion of the Yellowstone National Park.

In other words, this bill follows in the line of all the legislation that Congress has enacted in the past; in no particular does it make any departure from the well-recognized policy of Congress in reference to grants or the right of way through Indian reservations.

A bill similar to this was passed by the Senate in the Forty-ninth Congress, was favorably reported by the House committee, and went upon the Calendar. The present measure has been passed at this Congress by the Senate, has been favorably reported by the House committee, and is now upon the Calendar. The House bill being identical with the Senate bill, the latter has been substituted for consideration at this time.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Has there not been a minority report in this House against this bill?

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state the fact about that matter with great pleasure; it comes in as a part of my intended discussion of the proposition.

In the last Congress this bill having been passed by the Senate came to the House on the 15th day of February, and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL], chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, asked unanimous consent to take it up and pass it as it came from the Senate upon the ground that a similar bill reported favorably by the House committee was on the Calendar. Mr. Wakefield, then a member from Minnesota, objected. The bill that now comes up under suspension of the rules has received a favorable report from the House committee; but a minority consisting of three members, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS], and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr McSHANE] take exception to the passage of the bill. They base their position upon two declarations: First, that as the Rocky Fork and Cooke City Railroad bill which was passed by Congress March 3, 1887, just before the closing of the last Congress, gave to that company the right to construct a railroad, this bill would infringe the charter right given to that road. The requirement that the road be completed within two years is, as the minority contend, an implied guaranty that if this condition should be complied with Congress will not authorize a competing line. I merely wish to say that this clause requiring the road to be completed in two years is simply the qualification which ordinarily accompanies bills of this character. Congress on its part made no stipulation that in the future the right of way for the construction of a railroad through the Crow reservation should not be given to any other corporation.

But to show how unjust this position of the minority of the committee is with reference to the Billings, Clark's Fork and Cooke City Railroad Company, permit me to give briefly the history of these two roads. The present bill is antagonized on two grounds only—first, that this measure is an injustice to the road already chartered; and second, that it is intended simply for speculative purposes. To those two points I wish, in the few minutes I have, to direct attention.

The Billings, Clark's Fork and Cooke City Railroad Company was incorporated under the laws of the Territories of Wyoming and Montana February 20, 1886; Rocky Fork and Cooke City Railroad Company incorporated December 30, 1886.

Billings, Clark's Fork and Cooke City Railroad Company's maps filed October 22, 1886. Approved by Department of the Interior December 15, 1886. Rocky Fork and Cooke City Railroad Company's maps filed April 12, 1887. Approved by Department of the Interior October 16, 1887.

Billings, Clark's Fork and Cooke City Railroad Company's surveys completed October 22, 1886. Rocky Fork and Cooke City Railroad Company's line located April 12, 1887. (Organized December 30, 1886.)

Billings, Clark's Fork and Cooke City Railroad Company's bill introduced in Senate June 30, 1886; Passed February 11, 1887. Rocky Fork and Cooke City Railroad Company's bill introduced in Senate January 10, 1887; Passed February 24, 1887.

Billings, Clark's Fork and Cooke City Railroad Company's bill, reported favorably from House committee with amendments, January 14, 1887; Rocky Fork and Cooke City Railroad Company's bill, reported from House committee February 10, 1887; Rocky Fork and Cooke City Railroad Company's Senate bill, passed House, under suspension of the rules, March 3, 1887.

In Senate December 12, 1887. (S. 325.) Read twice and referred to Committee on Indian Affairs. In Senate February 9, 1888. Reported without amendment In Senate April 4, 1888. Passed Senate with amendment, "that no part of said line shall touch any portion of the National Park."

In House of Representatives April 5, 1888. (S. 325.) Referred to Committee on Indian Affairs. In House of Representatives April 13, 1888. Reported favorably and committed to Committee of the Whole House.

Every precedent act of incorporation under Territorial law, the filing of maps with the Interior Department and approval of same, completion of surveys, introduction of bill in Senate and passage of the same, favorable report from House committee and standing upon the Calendar antedate the Rocky Fork and Cooke City Railroad Company from one month to ten months.

Certainly that would not seem like a speculative operation to sell out to a road that was never thought of or conceived until months after the Billings, Clark's Fork and Cooke City Railroad had complied with all Territorial and United States statute requirements.

And the only reason the bill now under consideration was not passed in the last Congress was that one member, Mr. Wakefield, of Minnesota, had the power under the rules, by his objection, to prevent it. So much for the simple history of the two roads.

Now, as to the charge that this bill is gotten up for speculative purposes. It is stated in the minority report that—

> There being no possible use for two roads, the granting by Congress of an opposition and parallel right of way would work a great injustice to parties who have made investments in the Rocky Fork Company, and is liable to defeat the construction of any road.

I have read you the provision of the bill declaring that this company shall not assign or transfer or mortgage this right of way for any purpose whatever until the road shall be completed, that is, the entire road. What is the wording with reference to this short line, the Rocky Fork and Cooke City Railroad Company, that is to-day antagonizing this long line? I read from the act itself:

> That said company shall not assign or transfer or mortgage this right of way for any purpose whatever until said road shall be completed—

Completed to what extent? Completed its entire length? No.

> Completed through that part of said reservation through which it shall be constructed.

If there is any speculation on the part of either road in reference to this matter I leave it to the intelligence of this House to decide where the speculation is. In the case of the Rocky Fork and Cooke City road it is provided that the right of way shall not be assigned, transferred, or mortgaged until the road shall be built through the Crow reservation, a distance of 40 miles, while under this bill it is provided that the right of way shall not be assigned, transferred, or mortgaged for any purpose whatever "until said road shall be completed," covering specifically the entire length of the road, 120 miles.

Mr. FELTON. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether the going through the reservation is not all that Congress and the people it represents have anything to do with.

Mr. BINGHAM. Most assuredly.

Mr. FELTON. That is what I thought.

Mr. BINGHAM. I concede that; but my purpose is to show that the two Territories have given their consent and that this proposition is presented in perfect good faith on the part of this road. I am antagonizing the position taken by the three gentlemen who have signed the minority report and who state that the purpose of this measure is speculative, the object being to sell out the right of way.

Mr. FELTON. I only wanted the fact to appear.

Mr. BINGHAM. I reserve the residue of my time.

Mr. PEEL. How much time has the gentleman left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP in the chair). The gentleman has five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. TOOLE. I will yield for three minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, as one of the members of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I concur in the minority report, and I wish to say briefly that, in the judgment of three of the members of that committee who are opposed to the bill, it should not be passed by this House. Personally, I know nothing of this corporation, nor do I know anything of the incorporators of the other company. As has been suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], the Forty-ninth Congress passed a bill giving to a company the right to build across the Crow Creek reservation in Montana Territory. They did not succeed in getting their plats filed for some time as that mountainous region is a very cold country. Yet, subsequently to the filing of their plats, they have built 40 miles across that reservation, and expended something like $300,000 or more as an evidence of their good faith and as an evidence of their purpose to build the road according to the act of Congress.

Now, it is believed that this bill ought not to pass because it will embarrass that company in its efforts to complete the road under the act of Congress. They say it is universally admitted there is no business for two companies, that two railroads should not be constructed and operated in that sparsely-settled country. Hence, they say that this road, under the pending bill, was asking for a charter which would put them in a position to speculate and speculate only. Now, whether that is true or not, I do not pretend to say. As I said awhile ago, personally I do not know anything of either company, but it must be admitted by every man who gives thoughtful consideration to the subject, that there is no business there for two railroads. And the Territory of Montana says through its Delegate upon this floor that there is no business for two roads, and this company ought not to be given the privilege, which would have the effect only of paralyzing and frustrating the undertaking we authorized by the act of last Congress, and which is now in process of completion. We have, too, the protest of the Indians themselves against allowing another railroad across their reservation. The Indians say they do not want two railroads crossing their reservation.

Whoever is familiar with the topography of that country knows if the railroad contemplated by this bill is constructed, it must necessarily follow the same cañon the present company proposes to follow.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. PERKINS. I have only three minutes.

Mr. PAYSON. I assume the gentleman desires to be accurate. Does he not know these two roads run parallel for only 10 miles from the Yellowstone, and that then they diverge between the Big Horn range of the Snow Mountains, and that the coal fields sought to be reached by his company lie on the west side of this range, and the coal fields sought to be reached by the company named in this bill are on the east side of that range, which range is about 8 miles across and practically impassable?

Mr. PERKINS. No; I do not understand that to be the fact. I understand the opposite is true.

Mr. PAYSON. These two lines of road run parallel for not more than 10 miles, and there is no foundation in fact for any other statement than that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. After leaving the reservation it does follow the same line for 100 miles and more. There is no other place for the road than that.

Mr. TOOLE. I yield now for two minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I regret to be in an attitude of opposing any bill, and especially one under the circumstances, as I know gentlemen will raise the cry of "Monopoly" against me. I know it is an argument which is very plausible, that if it is good to have one road it is good to have more than one.

Now, I wish to tell the facts in reference to this matter. If gentlemen will look upon this map they will see that here is the reservation running down to this dotted line. All of these two railroads south of that is outside of the reservation.

In the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress this railroad got a bill passed by which they were to go through the corner of the Yellowstone reservation. The bill was called up by my friend from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON].

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman allow me to say——

Mr. NELSON. My time is so short that I can not yield.

Mr. PAYSON. The gentleman is mistaken; there is not a shadow of fact for the statement he is making.

Mr. NELSON. That company afterwards changed its plan and had the bill changed to give it this line.

Now, last year two bills were pending before Congress granting the right of way; one of the roads starting from a point on this map which I hold in my hand and following the dotted line shown here, known as the Rocky Fork road, and the other as the Billings road. Last year Congress passed the bill granting to the Rocky Fork Railroad Company the right to build up through these cañons to a certain coal deposit, but in the bill which passed then the road was required to be completed within two years, or in the event of a failure a forfeiture of its rights would follow. They had, to begin with, great difficulty in securing the right of way from the Indians themselves and in filing the necessary papers; and only last October the papers were approved and accepted by the Interior Department and the company was enabled to get to work. They did go to work, and built it, or rather they graded and constructed about 40 miles of the road.

They have expended in building that portion of the road, for bridges, embankments, etc., and in opening the coal-mines, upwards of half a million of dollars. You know that in that country winter comes quite early, and by the 1st of December, or rather by the middle of December, I believe, they were compelled to suspend operations, and there has not been an opportunity to do any work in the way of construction until now. They now say if the Government grants another right of way, practically parallel with their line, not only in the same direction but following to some extent the same cañons and valleys, you clip their wings and prevent them from completing the work, and the large sums of money which they have invested must be lost to them.

Now, while I am in favor of roads through the public domain, yet it is a fact that but one road is required there through that valley; and if you give another company the right of way, a conflict will be created, and one or the other will be driven to the wall; and this Congress will be instrumental, not intentionally of course, but will be instrumental in enabling one set of speculators in Wall street to take hold and choke off the men who projected the building of this line and who put their money into it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration is unobjectionable so far as its form is concerned. It is such a bill as was reported by the House committee in the last Congress, and such a one as met my approval at that time, and which, so far as its form is concerned, meets my approval now. At the last session of Congress I informed the friends of the bill that I did favor its passage, and early in the present session advised them that I would do whatever I could to promote its consideration. I did this upon the general principle that as a representative of the Territory of Montana I was in favor of granting rights of way to any and all railroad companies who desired to build roads in that Territory. They are the great factors in the development and settlement of the country, and unless there is some valid reason for opposing their construction, I would naturally be inclined to aid all such enterprises. I am constrained, however, to oppose the present consideration of this bill, and for reasons which, in my opinion, are satisfactory.

The simple facts are these: In March, 1887, Congress passed a bill granting the right of way over the Crow Indian reservation to the Rocky Fork and Cooke City Railway Company, under which the railroad company was to build and construct its road within two years from the date of the passage of that bill. It also provided for the definite location of the route and for obtaining the consent of the Indians. The company went to work diligently, definitely fixed the location of its line and procured the consent of the Indians, paid the compensation agreed upon, and graded, tied, and bridged 46 miles of its road. Having done this much, that company found it necessary to go to the markets of the East and negotiate its bonds to secure funds to insure the completion of the road. They have been acting in good faith and using every effort possible to complete the road according to the provisions of the bill. My information is that the passage of the present bill would materially embarrass and hinder the Rocky Fork and Cooke City road in negotiating their bonds, and would be likely to stifle the entire enterprise, the result of which would be that, instead of having two roads over the proposed line, the people of Montana would be the loser and neither road would be built.

This information is furnished me by gentlemen who are interested in the prosperity of the Territory, whose means of information are adequate, whose judgments are considered reliable, and whose characters are above reproach. It seems to me to be a plain business proposition. If the Rocky Fork and Cooke City Railroad Company with 46 miles of its line bridged, tied, and graded are unable to go into the market and negotiate their bonds in order to secure the completion of the line, it seems to me that little could be expected of the Billings and Cooke City road, for whom a right of way is now asked, who have not done one dollar's worth of work, and whose line is a parallel line to undeveloped coal fields.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. TOOLE. I have but a moment or two myself.

Mr. PAYSON. I merely wish to ask what the gentleman means by saying that this company has some 45 miles of its road built. Does not the gentleman know that there has not been a pound of iron laid on that line?

Mr. TOOLE. I said that distance had been graded, tied, and bridged.

Mr. PAYSON. I understood the gentleman to say it had been built.

Mr. TOOLE. No, sir; I shall make no misrepresentations to this House upon this proposition, for there is no one who is interested in the building of a railroad over the proposed line more than the people whom I represent. And in reply to the suggestion from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] that this is not a parallel line, I desire to inform him that it must be so considered in its strictest sense, because there is but one objective point of two roads, and both roads run through the Indian reservation, and having no point from which to draw its traffic except at the termini.

It must necessarily be considered a parallel line. The truth is, that the lines run alongside of each other for a distance of 11 miles, and at no point are they farther apart than 8 or 10 miles. It is therefore a matter of no consequence what the distance is between them, inasmuch as the only points from which they can draw their business are the termini, and in this connection permit me to say that the suggestion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] concerning the general law granting rights of way through public domain is not an analogous case, as will be apparent to every one.

There is but one desideratum with the people of the Territory of Montana in connection with this matter. They desire at least one road constructed to what is known as the Red Lodge coal-fields, and an extension of that line to the Cooke City mines. In its construction is involved the question of fuel supply to a large extent in that Territory, and, we hope, transportation to an important mineral section. This is the result desired by the people of Montana, and it matters little to them whether that is attained by the construction of one or the other of these roads. But confronted as I am with the facts which I have detailed to the House, it seems to me that there is but one thing to be done in justice to the people of the Territory, whose interests are greater than that of either of these companies, and that is to aid that road which is most likely to be built.

As before suggested, the Rocky Fork and Cooke City road has graded, bridged, and tied 46 miles of its line. By reason of the proposed parallel line, the Rocky Fork and Cooke City road has been prevented from negotiating their bonds, for every man of business knows that the granting of the right of way to a rival road would necessarily produce that effect. I am told that the people asking the right of way under the provisions of this bill claim that they have the money ready to build this competing line, and are only waiting to secure the right of way. So far as my observation and experience go, I do not think that railroads are built that way, and that it will eventually turn out, if this road is built, that the people representing it will, like the Rocky Fork and Cooke City people, build it by sale of its bonds.

I do not hesitate, from all the information in my possession, to give it as my deliberate opinion that if this right of way is granted at this time it simply stifles the old enterprise, and neither one of these roads will be built, or but one at least will be built. I am not opposed to the passage of this bill. The question now presented is whether the House will suspend the rules and pass the bill. What I desire in the premises is that the House will refuse to suspend the rules at this time and that the consideration of the bill may be delayed for at least thirty days, during which time I believe that the railroad company now constructing its road will be able to secure the necessary funds to complete it and that the Territory will be in the enjoyment of at least one of these roads. I want to give them an opportunity to secure the fruits of their labors. There are gentlemen connected with that enterprise who are constituents of mine, who have invested in it their fortunes, the accumulation of years of toil in that mountain country. They have invested their money, and I think it only fair that they should have a reasonable opportunity to reap the rewards of their labors so long as it does not conflict with the material interests of the Territory. As I have said before, I think they will be able to do this within thirty days, and when that time arrives I promise the friends of this bill that they shall have my hearty and cordial support to secure its consideration and passage.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Will the gentleman support this bill after thirty days have elapsed?

Mr. TOOLE. I have said to the friends of the bill that after thirty days I would aid its passage upon the floor of the House, and I consider it is asking but little under the circumstances that the consideration of this bill shall be postponed for that time.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is the gentleman of the opinion that if one road is not built the other will be?

Mr. TOOLE. I have said that if this right of way was granted before the road under construction was completed, that I very much feared that neither of the roads would be built, and I very much desire that both shall be.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Is there any necessity for two roads there?

Mr. TOOLE. I would dislike very much to make the admission that there is not, because that section of country has inexhaustible mineral resources, and no one can approximate the amount of transportation which it would furnish within a year or two.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Is there a necessity for it?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Is there a business necessity for two roads? There does not seem to be an immediate commercial necessity for the construction of two roads.

Mr. GOFF. Is this company chartered under the laws of Montana?

Mr. TOOLE. It is.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Under the general incorporation law?

Mr. TOOLE. Yes, sir. There is nothing in the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] that there are any equities in favor of the Billings and Cooke City road which are not possessed by the road under construction. They have proceeded in good faith from the time of the passage of the act granting their right of way; they have left nothing undone that it was possible for them to do, and they have done it as diligently as could be done under the circumstances, and while I am in favor of all possible competition by the construction of as many railroads as individuals or companies are willing to build, I believe that it would be an exhibition of punic faith which Congress ought not to tolerate, to give a right of way to this company at this time without giving it a fair opportunity within a reasonable time to secure the completion of its road and save the projectors of the enterprise what they have invested in it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask a question for information. I understand the gentleman from Montana to say that both these companies have been chartered by the Territorial Legislature.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOOLE. They have been incorporated under the general laws of the Territory. I trust the consideration of this bill will be postponed, that the rules will not be suspended in order to pass it to-day. Have I any time remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP). The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PEEL. It is not a pleasant duty for the Committee on Indian Affairs to antagonize the wishes of the gentleman from Montana. After the bill had been discussed for hours and hours by the attorneys for these corporations I was in favor of a postponement, that the men who had undertaken the construction of the road might have an opportunity to negotiate the bonds. But three solid months have passed and they have not yet negotiated the bonds. And the question is, can the Committee on Indian Affairs or can this House afford to postpone this bill in the interest of another private corporation?

The fact is, this company was incorporated, had their surveys made, and they were filed with the Secretary of the Interior and were approved. Both bills came before the Committee on Indian Affairs in the last Congress. They were reported favorably, and by accident one got through and the other did not.

Now, it is but fair, it is a matter of common justice and right between man and man, between individuals, and between the people interested in those companies, that there should be right of way granted for both those roads. The Territory chartered them both, and the people there ought to know.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The Delegate ought to know, too.

Mr. PEEL. And the Delegate from Wyoming, where this road goes and terminates, supports this bill. I hope this House will not put itself on record as refusing a right of way through the Indian country for a railroad.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Did not the President veto one bill because we gave too many rights of way?

Mr. PEEL. No, sir; he never had this bill before him.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Not this, but another bill.

Mr. PEEL. I do not yield. I have no interest whatever in this matter, but I am not willing to see a monopoly granted to a private corporation to the exclusion of another, especially when this company was incorporated and started and had mapped out its route and filed the map with the Secretary of the Interior and had it approved before the other one commenced at all.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand the gentleman to say that bills were reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs in the last Congress granting the right of way to both these roads.

Mr. PEEL. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. And there was no contest about it then, I understand.

Mr. PEEL. None whatever in the last Congress. There was a unanimous report on both bills. The opposition in our committee-room now has come solely from this other railroad. There is no opposing interest on the part of the Government, or of anybody else, except this other railroad company and its friends.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. PEEL. No, sir. Don't bother me, if you please.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. You allowed the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] to ask you a question. I don't want to bother you.

Mr. PEEL. Mr. Speaker, if we suspend the passage of this bill for two or three weeks to enable this company to negotiate their bonds, the matter will be hanging over us then just the same as it is now. Let us dispose of it now, extend this right of way, and give the people the benefit of the competing lines. For my part, I wish that every railroad in this country was compelled to compete with another.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] to suspend the rules and pass this bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore declared that, in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds had voted in favor of the motion.

Mr. TOOLE. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 112, noes 40.

So (further count not being called for, and two-thirds having voted in favor of the motion) the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Agriculture to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk, being a bill (H. R. 8191) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture, and to create an Executive Department to be known as the Department of Agriculture.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture and to create an Executive Department to be known as the Department of Agriculture.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Department of Agriculture established at the seat of Government of the United States shall be an Executive Department, to be known as the Department of Agriculture, under the supervision and control of a Secretary of Agriculture, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and section 158 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended to include such Department, and the provisions of Title IV of the Revised Statutes, including all amendments thereto, are hereby made applicable to said Department.

SEC. 2. That there shall be in said Department an Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall perform such duties as may be required by law or prescribed by the secretary.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall hereafter receive the same salary as is paid to the Secretary of each of the Executive Departments, and the salary of the First Assistant Secretary of Agriculture shall be the same as that now paid to the Assistant Secretary of the Department of the Interior.

SEC. 4. That all laws and parts of laws relating to the Department of Agriculture now in existence, as far as the same are applicable and not in conflict with this act, and only so far, are continued in full force and effect.

SEC. 5. That the Weather Service of the United States Signal Service Bureau is hereby transferred to the Department of Agriculture, to take effect July 1, 1888, and shall consist of one chief and such subordinate officers and employés as may be necessary to efficiently manage said bureau. Until otherwise provided by law, the present organization of the subordinate force of said bureau, including the second lieutenants now in service, shall continue as at present: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed as altering or affecting in any way the present status in the Army of the commissioned officers of the Signal Corps. The chief of said bureau shall receive an annual compensation of $4,500, and be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate: Provided, That the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, in addition to his strictly military duties, may be assigned to the charge of the Weather Bureau until a chief shall be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate; and the compensation now paid to the employés and enlisted men of said service shall continue as now; and the moneys appropriated for said service and hereafter appropriated shall be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of the Department of Agriculture.

The Secretary of War is authorized and directed, within thirty days after the passage of this act, to appoint a board of three Army officers, of which the Chief Signal Officer shall be a member. The duty of said board shall be to make an inventory of all property now in the control and possession of the Signal Service Bureau, and shall separate and turn over to the Department of Agriculture such portions of the property as the said board may determine to be suitable for the work of the Signal Service Weather Bureau. The remainder of the property shall remain in the control of the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded? If not, the question will be upon the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH].

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this bill has been so often discussed in this House and has passed the House by such large majorities, I ask unanimous consent that members who desire to do so may print remarks upon the bill in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH]?

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman if he will not consent to take a vote upon an amendment striking out the fifth section. That section transfers to this new department the Weather Bureau——

Mr. HATCH. I have sent the bill to the Clerk's desk under the instructions of my committee, and I say to the gentleman that I have no authority from that committee to change it in any respect.

Mr. HERBERT. Will you not allow a vote on that?

Mr. HATCH. I can not. The bill is presented just as it passed the House and the Senate.

Mr. HERBERT. Then I demand a second.

Mr. HATCH. Then I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HATCH. Now, Mr. Speaker, I renew my request that gentlemen desiring to do so may have leave to print remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] to control the time in support of the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] to control the time in opposition to it.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I will reserve my time and let the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] say what he has to say in opposition to it.

Mr. HERBERT. I asked the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] whether he would consent to a separate vote on a motion to amend the bill by striking out the fifth section. That section of the bill provides for the transfer of the Weather Bureau to this new department, and contemplates a reorganization of the bureau as it at present exists. That bureau is, in my opinion, one of the most efficient in the service of the Government. Its present chief is the only head of a bureau that I know of anywhere under this Government who has of his own motion reduced by a very large percentage—probably 20 per cent.—the expenses of his bureau without in the least impairing its efficiency. I agree with the authors of this bill that the Weather Bureau is chiefly important to the farmers, and it is the farmers of this country who chiefly pay the taxes and who are mostly interested in having an efficient and economical administration of the bureau. Since General Greely has been put at the head of it he has reduced by $100,000 the annual expenses of the bureau, and it is more efficient now than it was when General Hazen administered it.

General Greely has also made recommendations which as he claims will further reduce the expenses of the bureau by about $112,000. Now, what is the reason for dispensing with the present organization of the bureau? Why abolish the present officers who have grown up in the service and who know more about it than anybody can know who has not their experience? I think General Greely has been in this service—I am certain that others of the officers have been there—from fifteen to twenty years.

This bill contemplates the dismissing of these experienced officers and appointing new ones, civilians. It is true there is a provision that the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, General Greely, in addition to his strictly military duties, may be assigned to the charge of the bureau, but how long? Only till a chief shall be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. That is to say, if any gentleman will read this important bill which the committee seeks to drive through this House with only fifteen minutes' debate on either side, he will discover that the purpose is to dismiss General Greely and these other officers, and form a new organization which is to be composed entirely of civilians, and, so far as we can see, men of no experience. There are no men in this country, as I understand, who have sufficient character and experience to be placed at the head of that bureau except these Army officers. And why is it that this bill seeks to strike down that bureau? Mr. Speaker, I reserve the residue of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has ten minutes remaining.

Mr. HERBERT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, if I could see any benefit to result to the farmers of the country from this bill I would give it my cordial support. I have been unable to see in the legislation of Congress anything which can specifically promote agriculture. Legislation has aided various other branches of industry, but as I observe the condition of things in this country I can not see anything we can do here toward advancing the interests of agriculture except by economy in legislation and economy in administration, to be followed by a reduction of taxation.

What is proposed in this bill for the purpose of advancing agriculture? You have to-day the Agricultural Bureau in existence, with all its functions; and what are you proposing now? Simply to create some new offices. You propose to make the head of that Department a Cabinet officer, with increased salary; and you propose to create an assistant who is to receive a liberal salary. Beyond this, except transferring to the Agricultural Department the Signal Service—a service which, so far as I know, is well conducted to-day—there is nothing in this bill. I can not see anything in it for the purpose of promoting agriculture; and I will not, because of the designation of the measure, because it purports in mere words to be in the interest of agriculture, give a stone to the agricultural interest when bread would be much more acceptable.

I have voted time and again against this proposition because I could not see in the bills hitherto offered anything calculated to advance the interest of agriculture in this country, but simply propositions to create a Cabinet officer, with additional bureaus and clerks. In the present bill not a single additional duty except the one I have named is given to the officer at the head of the Agricultural Department. I do not hear any complaint of any lack of capacity in the narrow circle of work which has been hitherto assigned to this branch of the public service. I have heard no suggestions of additional work presenting anything helpful to agriculture.

In some of the former bills providing for creating a Department of Agriculture, "labor" has been associated with agriculture. In this way it has been proposed to take away duties from other Departments of the Government and add them to this department, in order that this great Cabinet officer, not being sufficiently occupied with matters of agriculture, might have something more to do. This is all that I have been able to discover, and for one, representing as I do an agricultural constituency, I will not support by my voice or vote a measure which means nothing except increase of offices, increase of salaries, increase of expenditures, and pro tanto an obstruction to the reduction of taxation.

Mr. HERBERT. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES].

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say only a word in opposition to this measure. Outside of the question of the constitutional power and right of Congress to pass this bill, which I deny, I can not see in it a solitary feature which is calculated in any degree to benefit the farming interest of the country. That great interest is not to be benefited by the paternal care of this Government. What those engaged in that industry desire from the General Government, and what is most beneficial to them, is that they be let alone, that the Government lay its hands upon them as lightly as possible, imposing only such burdens in the way of taxation as are absolutely necessary, and allowing the farmers to work out their own destiny in their own way. Let Congress legislate, as it may rightfully do, to give to farm products the best market facilities, and do not tax the farmer to death to foster other industries, and they are content. They do not come here as some of your skilled labor organizations, and seek the largesses and paternal care of the Federal Government, and I trust they never will.

The creation of a Cabinet officer at the head of a great Department with numerous clerks will not increase the agricultural productiveness of the country to the extent of a single hill of beans; it will merely create additional offices for politicians to fill, and that is not in the interest of agriculture. It is said that this bill will dignify farming as a business. It will do nothing of the kind. The business of farming is already the most dignified, honorable, and independent of any in this boasted land of freedom. A Cabinet officer of agriculture in imitation of the monarchical governments of Europe is another step in the direction of centralization. It involves a multiplication of offices and consequently of expenditures, which the politicians, place-hunters, and men who work in the shade will seek and obtain, but a single farmer will never reach the humblest of them. They will be left to follow the plow as at present and pay a small increase of taxes to meet the increased expenditure which this will impose.

Mr. HERBERT. I presume the advocates of this bill have a right to conclude the debate; but I would like to hear from the other side in response to the objections I have made to the bill. I think it is only fair that I should know something of the answer of the other side before I occupy the four minutes left to me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman reserve the remainder of his time?

Mr. HERBERT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to occupy the time of the House in discussing this bill. It has been so often discussed here, and the speeches of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] and the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] have been so often answered by the overwhelming vote of this House, and by every farmers' organization in Alabama and Georgia, as well as every other State in the Union, that it is absolutely unnecessary to pay any further attention to those objections?

Mr. OATES. The first "answer" cited by the gentleman is not a very important one.

Mr. HATCH. Certainly the farmers of this country, when their organizations meet in county, district, or State assemblies, and in national conventions, ought to know as well what they want and require as do the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman allow me to put a question?

Mr. HATCH. With pleasure.

Mr. OATES. If the organizations to which the gentleman refers know exactly what Congress ought to do, do not the Grand Army organizations know what Congress ought to do, and do not the associations of manufacturers know what Congress ought to do?

Mr. HATCH. Well, sir, the farmers of this country, throughout the length and breadth of the land, are above any other organization on earth. They are not an incorporated body, and they are less organized than any other class of people; and they are more imposed upon than any other class.

Mr. OATES. I agree to the latter proposition.

Mr. HATCH. They have been knocking at the doors of Congress for ten long years, asking the passage of a bill of this character; and nothing in the world except the high respect which the constituents of the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Alabama have for them upon other questions——

Mr. OATES. Allow me to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. HATCH. Let me get through with my sentence. The gentleman stops me right in the middle of a question. I know both gentlemen are popular at home, but the farmers in Georgia and Alabama are not as much interested as those in the Mississippi Valley.

Mr. OATES. During my service as a member upon this floor I wish to say that I have not received a single petition from Alabama in favor of this proposition.

Mr. HATCH. It was because they knew you were against the bill, and they therefore sent them to the Commissioner of Agriculture instead of to the gentleman from Alabama. [Laughter and applause.]

I wish to call attention to the fact that the fourth section of this bill was drawn, as I am informed, under the direction and with the approval of General Greely himself. It was authorized by the Senate committee, passed the Senate, and came over in the last Congress attached to this bill. It does not legislate General Greely out of office; not a bit of it. It is simply hypercriticism of the bill and of that section of the bill. It transfers to the Department of Agriculture one of the most important bureaus of the Government, that of the Weather Reports. It will make it more efficient than before. I have already said more than I intended. I will yield now to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. McCLAMMY].

Mr. STEELE. Let me inquire of the gentleman from Missouri, if you transfer by this bill the Weather Bureau to the Agricultural Department then what do you leave of the Signal Service to General Greely?

Mr. HATCH. I have yielded the floor to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. McCLAMMY. Mr. Speaker, the bill now pending before the House ought to commend itself to every member by reason of the vast interests with which it deals, and of its purpose to elevate and dignify the great and basic pursuit of American citizens. It ought to commend itself to them regardless of political proclivities and affiliations. It dragoons into its service no partisan follower. It appeals for support to no sectional issue, fixes no parallel beyond which it may not enter, because the subject with which it deals is as broad as the American continent and as absorbing as the institutions of our great Republic. There is no other interest so vast or so vital as the interest of agriculture.

There is no other pursuit whose followers are so numerous, or whose wealth in the aggregate is so great and so permanent as they are in agriculture, none upon which we are so dependent in peace and in war. We have, sir, a Department of State whose able head watches with the jealousy of lofty patriotism and eternal vigilance the international rights of our free and prosperous country. That Department is rightly dignified by giving to its chief a Cabinet position. We have a Secretary of War whose stainless sword enforces through the patriotic courage of our citizen soldierly the commands of the civil law, to which it is forever subordinate and tributary.

Our great postal routes, with their bewildering and mazy ramifications, have at their head a genius and spirit of order whose voice is potential in the councils of the Cabinet. We have a Secretary of the Navy who deserves not only the high and commanding influence of his proud position, but also the pæans of national praise for his heroic efforts to make our Navy what our Navy was when our country's colors were nailed to the top-mast and floated triumphant and glorious amid the thousand fleets that sought its destruction. In that Cabinet is a Secretary of the Treasury worthy of his place and the exalted regard of his countrymen. He has diverted for a time into the natural and lawful channels of trade and industry those pactolian streams that have hitherto been lost in the great dead sea of a bursting treasury, whose fulness is waste and whose wealth is but ruin.

We have in the Cabinet a Secretary of the Interior, who seeks to refine and civilize the savage tribes upon our distant border, to watch over that extensive domain reclaimed by his illustrious predecessor from the soulless corporations, who, despite the Jeffersonian spirit of our age and institutions, would despoil the teeming millions of the coming century of happy homes beneath the ægis of American liberty. All of these great interests are elevated into potential influences in the formation of a governmental policy. And yet, sir, the interest of agriculture is greater than all, and inferior to all in the place accorded it. The countless millions of our own population are fed and clothed by the American farmer. The grain waving in golden beauty upon the great plains of the West, the cotton drifting like summer snow upon the fields of the South, freight the fleets of nations and loose their sails, thread continents with tracks of steel, fill the earth with the roar of trains, and heap for trade and commerce and useful art those stores that make a nation great. It is the brawn and muscle of labor that is felling our forests, building our cities, developing our mines, and accomplishing in a thousand varied ways the marvelous destiny of freedom's great empire.

Traffic is regulated by agricultural reports. Capital, with its vast and fatally increasing power, waits in thralldom upon advices from the harvest. The resistless spirit of American energy grapples with hooks of steel to the great commercial centers the most distant sections, upon which Ceres pours her favors and bids everything keep pace with her measureless advance. The movement of crops is watched to-day with an interest like that which centered upon the movement of armies when our country trembled in the throes of mighty revolution. Where, sir, are the sinews of our strength, if they are not found in our great diversified agricultural products? What victorious hosts ever waved as joyous banners as those that float above the tasseled maize from the snows of Maine to the spicy groves of California? What spirit of beauty hovers above Southern fields when fleecy bolls uncover to crown their king!

What a marvelous power, that has defied for a quarter of a century grievous political wrong more destructive than pestilence and more cruel than war! What a marvelous people, that have borne without revolt an utter abandonment of their interest by legislative bodies and a merciless war by monopolies upon their great pursuit! Of what crime have they been convicted, that they are thus punished? What greater conservators of social laws have you than they? What people more distinguished for patriotic love of liberty than those who, reared amid pastoral scenes, cling to the home of their birth, its customs and its laws, with more than a Switzer's love for the heights and lakes of his own dear Switzerland? What other people in your midst can you so rely upon in peace or in war? Who filled the great armies in that immortal struggle of the blue and gray and baptized American valor anew in an ever-widening and brightening fame?

Sir, there are sylvan retreats all over this land, sequestered nooks rich in idyllic charm, sacred forevermore to warrior spirits who left these quiet scenes at their country's call to return no more, unknown and yet immortal. In obedience to that pure and holy patriotism their survivors without regard to geographic division have waited for a recognition of their great claim, not alone upon capital that has sought and justified every pretext for their robbery and spoliation, not alone upon trusts and combines more hurtful than floods and frosts, but upon the American Congress they have waited in the vain hope that their numbers, their wealth, their intelligence, and, more than all, their devotion and importance would secure for them remedial legislation.

While they have waited they have witnessed many novel occurrences. They have seen a contraction in the volume of currency so great as to beggar their industry; manufacturers arrayed against them; common carriers pooling their freights to their manifest injury; Standard Oil Companies waxing mighty upon their wretchedness; gamblers in futures gloating upon their ruin; everywhere hostile organizations; everywhere lurking assassins; yea, even the very arches of her temple have rung to the footfalls of treason when agricultural statistics were fabricated in the interest of monopoly. But despite these hostile surroundings, despite the miserable pittance realized for their products by reason of the accursed policy of contraction, despite storm and flood and drought, they annually add three billions of wealth to the American people. They annually feed and clothe our vast population. They annually export to other countries such a vast surplus of food and raw material that the tax, even, upon the importations paid for by these agricultural products is sufficient to pay for the vast expenses of government, and under existing laws to fill the Treasury with dead and useless capital. They light the fires in every forge; turn the countless wheels of every industrial enterprise; gird continents with glittering threads of steel and hurrying steeds of fire; whiten the seas with the sails of commerce; pour upon all lands and all peoples and every human pursuit the fatness which their toil has wrought from the earth.

They are starving of a money famine while the Treasury vaults are bursting with tons of idle gold. Crippled, they limp upon the earth while lordly manufactures and pious combines mount with eagle's wings to the empyrean realms of boundless wealth and power. Each passing year beholds new favorites of the salvation trusts dubbed Sir Knight and Millionaire by Prince Aladdin's sword, and millions of these patient toilers amerced anew to support the royal favorites.

But light is breaking upon their long night. They, too, are combining for their protection—this great host, who have in their keeping every political possibility of this Government, are organizing; the accursed policy of contraction in the volume of the currency can not always fetter them; the cry of overproduction can no longer deceive them; an inferior place in the Government can no longer satisfy them. They ask a place upon the advisory board of the Government; to be consulted in every measure pertaining to the general welfare, because their pursuit is the basis upon which the general welfare rests. Who shall oppose them in their righteous demand?

Who shall stay them when they summon their clans? Can you fetter the ocean? Can you arrest the avalanche? Can you deny justice to millions of your long-suffering and confiding countrymen? Shall the policy of building up one pursuit at the expense of another be eternally continued? Or shall our policy be like the sun in his benefi-cent journey, as he lights the summit and valley to favor honest toil and industry everywhere, until the cry of classism shall cease from the land, until self-reliance and sturdy independence shall regain their power, and the American people with deserved trust in their rulers and representatives shall satisfy the world that this great country, under the guidance of God and the ægis of liberty, belongs neither to millionaire or anarchist, but to the people and the whole people, who are accomplishing with brain and brawn and great forbearance the marvelous destiny of freedom's great empire.

Mr. HATCH. I now yield for one minute to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the passage of this bill, in the first place, because the farmers in my State want it; and in the second place, because it is right. We have around the council board of the nation gathered the Secretary of War, representing a few thousand men in epaulettes or carrying muskets. We have the Secretary of the Navy, representing a few vessels floating and some others to float, and some which will not float. [Laughter.] We have the chief of the postal system of the country, and so I might go on and say we have a number of men gathered there around the council board of the nation representing various interests, giving the President advice and helping in the direction of public affairs, but the most important interest of all in the United States, the agricultural interest, has no one there as its special representative, and it is about time that it had. [Applause.] I am in favor of the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HATCH. I yield now for three minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CARLTON].

Mr. CARLTON. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry so short a time has been allotted me to speak on so important a subject, yet I am glad to know that my first appearance on the floor of this House is in behalf of the great interest of agriculture. [Applause.]

That it becomes necessary in this case, after the debate we have had for the past few weeks, to speak in support and defense of this important and foundation interest of the whole country is to me a matter of profound surprise.

My distinguished and esteemed colleague [Mr. BLOUNT], who has just preceded me, will pardon me for saying that I am almost equally surprised that he should find it consistent with his views to oppose this measure, living as he does in an agricultural district, knowing full well the necessity of improved, progressive, and better sustained agriculture in our land, and being himself a farmer. [Laughter and applause.]

During the course of the tariff debate which has been had in this House for weeks past no interest in America (and properly so, too) has received greater consideration or been watched with more zealous care than agriculture. Especially has this been true of gentlemen, who here, represent the great agricultural sections of the Union.

The line of their arguments, and, to my mind, the force and justice of their position has been that in considering, readjusting, and reforming our economic system this industrial interest of the country should receive equal and just rights, with other interests, as well as fostering care at the hands of our Government.

Mr. Speaker, I submit, why should not this interest receive, at all times, the highest consideration at the hands of the Government? Why should it not receive the most constant and watchful care and consideration at the hands of Congress? It is, at least, 73 per cent. of the whole industrial interest of the country. It is, beyond doubt, the basis, the solid foundation of that growing commercial and industrial interest which is fast becoming the pride of America. What would be the fate of our manufacturing, commercial, and other varied industries if it was not for American agriculture? If this interest be not sustained, where with all shall they subsist and be maintained?

But, Mr. Speaker, they tell us that this measure contemplates the creation of new and superfluous offices; that it will only enlarge the salaries to be paid out of the Treasury. I do not so regard this bill. It only seeks to enlarge, to make more important and valuable to the agricultural interest of the whole country, the existing Agricultural Department; to dignify and elevate this Department alongside with other Departments of the Government, and where, certainly, it has a right to be. But admit, for the sake of the argument, that it would create new offices and require something more of salaries in order to maintain and make more useful and efficient this all-important Department. Is this an argument against it if it is right, just, and necessary for the promotion and improvement of this great foundation interest?

The overflowing surplus in the Treasury of $150,000,000, which is far beyond all needs of the Government, is now very properly a matter of our greatest legislative concern. In our efforts to reduce this unprecedented plethora of our Treasury, and perchance to provide against its further increase, is it right or just, I would ask, to deny to the agricultural interest of the country its fair, equitable, and much needed benefits of government; and that, too, when the hard-worked and poorly-paid farmers of the land, constituting as they do so large a percentage of our population, have contributed so largely towards filling to redundancy the coffers of "the best government the world ever saw?"

Mr. Speaker, disclaiming all that might appear as invidious comparison, I would most respectfully submit, is not agriculture quite as important and necessary to the support and maintenance of the country and its varied interests as is our postal system? The one might be said to be, in a large degree, a convenience and a comfort, perchance a luxury, to the people; the other, an absolute and primary necessity. While upholding our Agricultural Department, and anxious as I am for its enlarged usefulness and efficiency, yet it must be said that the pretended governmental support and maintenance given to agriculture in this country to day amounts to nothing more than a farce.

While I commend in the highest terms the industry, the zeal, the efficiency, and the exceeding great courtesy of the honorable Commissioner of Agriculture, yet this Department, with its meagre appropriation given it by Congress, restricting thereby its powers of usefulness, when, if enlarged, it might be made a blessing and a benefit to the whole people engaged in agricultural pursuits, and consequently to the whole country, has so far proven but an annoyance to Congressmen, requiring of them much of mere clerical duty to their constituents, oftentimes to the interference with more important duties, with comparatively, but little benefit to the latter, and positively none to the great system of agriculture throughout the country.

Mr. Speaker, Napoleon Bonaparte, in all of his greatness, in all of the splendor of his military genius, was never so great as when, after his mighty military campaigns, he rose to that magnificent position of statesmanship wherein he laid down the civil code for the restoration and the resuscitation, the growth and prosperity of France. He said:

First. Agriculture, the soul, the first basis of the empire. Second. Industry, the comfort and happiness of the population. Third. Trade, the superabundance, the proper application of the surplus of agriculture and industry.

Then, emulating so great a statesman, let us to-day be wise unto the interests of our whole country; let us be just and fair to the largest and most important interest which should command our legislative care; let this bill pass, even at the risk of creating a few more offices and a few more salaries, to be paid out of a Treasury overflowing with its $150,000,000 surplus. [Applause.]

Mr. HERBERT. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] one minute.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] has taken occasion to voice the sentiment of agriculture all over this country, Georgia, Alabama, and Louisiana. I claim, sir, to know as much about and to be as loyal to the interests of my constituents as any gentleman on this floor, especially if he lives in Missouri. The fact that he happens to be at the head of the Committee on Agriculture gives him no right to superiority of opinion in this House on that question.

I do not know why my constituents have seen fit to keep me here. It does not become me to inquire; but I do know that when my judgment leads me to believe a measure is right or wrong, I have self-respect enough to vote my convictions no matter what clamor may be excited here by appealing to the record of the House in the past, and its hurried legislation. I shall vote against this measure because it has nothing in the world in it except salaries; and I have a constituency intelligent enough, when I shall lay my reasons before them, to appreciate and respect them.

Mr. HATCH. How much time is remaining in opposition?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One minute and a half.

Mr. HERBERT. I had four minutes, I understood the Chair to say, and yielded one to the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not understand that the gentleman had put any limitation upon the time yielded to the gentleman from Georgia, but will of course accept his statement. The gentleman from Alabama has three minutes remaining.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, any gentleman who will take pains to read the fifth section of this bill will, I think, be driven to the conclusion that it contemplates not only the creation of a new bureau, but the displacement of the officers who are now conducting the weather service. I have not time to show this fully in three minutes, but the bill provides first for a chief, second for his salary, and, finally, there is a proviso to the effect that the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, General Greely, "in addition to his strictly military duties," may be assigned to the Weather Bureau "until a chief shall be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate." That provision, taken in connection with what precedes, can only be fairly construed to mean that the present Chief of the Signal Service is only to be allowed temporarily to remain in charge of that office in addition to his duties as a military officer, and that then another and a different officer is to be appointed.

So much for that. My objection on that point is that the bill does contemplate the destruction of the present bureau and the creation of another more expensive and less efficient, because conducted by officers who have not had the experience.

Mr. STEELE. It does not destroy it, but there will be two departments.

Mr. HERBERT. I regret I have not the time to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STEELE. It transfers the Weather Bureau and leaves the Signal Bureau.

Mr. HERBERT. Yes, that is what it does; and now in reply to what has been said by the chairman of the committee I have but a word. I am sure he is mistaken in supposing General Greely wrote this section; I am sure he would not favor the transfer, and have reason for what I am saying. Now, sir, the gentleman from North Carolina said he favored this bill because it dignified agriculture. Is that the ground upon which gentlemen, representatives of the people, propose to pass this bill? Does agriculture need to be dignified? Can the farmer of this country be dignified by anything this Congress can do? As a representative of the farmers I scout the idea. Agriculture is already not only the most ancient but the most independent and most honorable of all professions, and far above the efforts of Congress or any other body of living men to dignify by legislation.

The farmers need no such decoration. They stand upon their own merits. What they do need is substantial legislation. I have voted to the Bureau of Agriculture always the most liberal appropriations for seeds, for publications, for experimental stations; for everything that I believe will benefit them I stand here ready to vote. I know this bill will pass this House, but I, by my action now, am simply predicting that it will not benefit the farmer to turn his bureau from a business department, which it now is, into a political machine; it will not help him any to put at the head of it a politician who, if the protectionists ever again get possession of the Government, will use this department we are creating for the dissemination of protection sentiments, for the scattering of protection documents, to reconcile the people to onerous and oppressive taxation. What I would do for the farmer is to relieve him now from the burdens that are weighing him down to the earth; not multiply offices and pile up taxes on him, but go honestly to work to pass the Mills bill and stay here all the summer, if necessary, to do it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, in the short time allotted me I can say but little on this most important subject.

The bill under consideration deals with the agricultural interests of the country and seeks to give them recognition at the hands of the Government.

Agriculture forms the basis of American prosperity and independence; with its prosperity comes thrift and happiness; with its failure all other industries languish.

The farming class comprise more than one-half of all the people engaged in productive industries; in most of the States they constitute more than one-half the voters and pay more than one-half of the taxes levied for governmental purposes. They control nearly five million farms and cultivate about 300,000,000 acres of land. Their farm products, on the farm, are worth $4,000,000,000. Farming in this country has increased 300 per cent. in a generation, and the skill of our people displayed in the construction of farming implements and machinery is not surpassed in the world. Why, then, should not our farmers have a voice in the administration of the Government, and why should not the present Department of Agriculture be elevated to a dignity commensurate with its great importance to the nation?

Agriculture is the oldest occupation of man, and through all past ages has been most honorable. It is the foundation of our earliest civilization, and its development denotes human progress with as much certainty as the sun's light increases the growth of vegetation. To me it is a matter of wonder that the country has legislated so much about all other great interests and so little about agriculture. If manufacturing, mining, railroading and navigation, commerce, labor, and trade are proper subjects of legislation, why not agriculture?

The Government now has under its control and in operation an Agricultural Department, and for the means furnished and appliances at its command it no doubt does all it can; it has and is now accomplishing substantial benefits. But if this bill should become a law the chief of this department will become a Cabinet officer. This will give the cause of agriculture a voice in the affairs of government and no doubt will stimulate those who are engaged in tilling the soil to higher aims, and much good will be accomplished.

The bill also transfers to this department the "Weather Bureau," which is now controlled by the War Department. This, it seems to me, is most proper. What could be more beneficial than for those engaged in agriculture to possess a thorough knowledge of the weather. Rainfall, heat, cold, storm, and sunshine are potential influences that affect the farmers of the country more than those engaged in any other pursuit or calling. And since the Government has undertaken to furnish information touching these matters, it appears most reasonable that the Weather Bureau should be under the control of the Agricultural Department.

Mr. Speaker, this bill does not create a new department of government, but only seeks to elevate, enlarge, and make more efficient a department already organized. Will not the passage of this bill commend itself to the farmers as an evidence that the Government holds their industry in high esteem, and that as far as the Constitution and laws will allow will extend its fostering care to it as readily as to any other industry?

Mr. Speaker, as a justification for our conduct in favoring this bill, and as a part, I trust, of interesting history, I beg to call the attention of the House to the conduct of other governments with reference to the subject of agriculture and kindred industries.

Mr. Speaker, the establishment of an agricultural department the chief officer of which ranks with the heads of the other departments of government in the countries of Europe is a regulation of long standing. France, Austria, Prussia, Italy, and Russia each has a department of government denominated "the ministry of agriculture and commerce." This department of government takes jurisdiction in most of these countries of the subjects of agriculture, animal industry, forestry, draining, food supplies, external and internal commerce, manufacturing, labor, mineralogy, and geology. They procure and furnish for the people of their respective countries most valuable information, such as depth of rainfall, heat, and the testing of the growth of vegetation, as well as making experiments with the most improved implements of husbandry. They procure statistics of the number of acres of land in cultivation, and the number of laborers engaged in various industrial pursuits, together with the sanitary condition of the country, and the effect of labor upon the health of those engaged in manufacturing and other pursuits.

The sums of money which those countries of Europe annually spend in the cause of agriculture is an evidence of the importance which they attach to agriculture and kindred industries.

France expends about	$8,000,000
Austria expends about	4,000,000
Russia expends about	14,000,000
Prussia expends about	3,000,000
Italy expends about	3,000,000

Shall this country, with a territory of almost boundless acres, with a climate and soil greatly surpassing that of Europe, fail to appreciate its superior advantages by not making it the greatest agricultural country on the globe? Who can deny but that in the near future the rainfall and melting snows of vast mountain ranges will be gathered into reservoirs, and by processes of irrigation cause millions of acres of land in this country now uncultivated to yield a rich harvest capable of sustaining a dense population?

If fully developed how vast are our resources. The State of California contains more acreage of arable land than Great Britain and Ireland. Texas is larger than the great Republic of France with Switzerland and Servia included. Our cotton fields include more acres than Sweden, Denmark, Holland, and Belgium.

The imperial domain of Russia has less land in cultivation than the United States.

America produces about one-half of the cotton raised upon the globe for commercial purposes. About two-thirds of the corn of which we have any census record is grown in the United States.

Our tobacco crop equals that grown in all other countries. In view of the adaptation of this country to agricultural pursuits, and in view of the fact that the happiness and prosperity of the people depends so largely upon this industry, is it not the part of statesmanship that Congress, by appropriate legislation, recognize its importance and contribute all within its power towards its advancement?

Having been raised upon a farm and inured to the duties of farm life, without affectation I can say that farmers have the warmest sympathy of my heart, and if I could say one word or do one act which would lighten their burdens or make plenty and contentment dwell within their homes it would be the proudest aim of my life.

When I remember that the Southland, from the Potomac to the Rio Grande, has for these twenty-four years struggled to rebuild homes made desolate by the red hand of war, and at this hour farm mortgages cover what were once happy homes, I would be less than a man and devoid of a proper sense of humanity did I not feel deeply for the farmers of the South; and while some question both the propriety and the constitutionality of this bill, and while it is not the province of the Government to engage in farming or in any private enterprise for the benefit of an individual or combination of individuals, yet, under the Constitution, the Government has the right to promote the general welfare of the United States, and without entering into any discussion of the constitutionality of this measure I will give the farmers the benefit of the doubt and vote for it. Trusting that the wisdom of those placed in charge of this Department will devise such methods as will infuse new life into this great industry, may not the adoption of this measure be the means of establishing the farming interests of this country upon a basis which shall not only command the admiration of all, but make it a lasting blessing to humanity?

Some seem to fear that the passage of this bill will require a greater expenditure of money. Let it be so. We spend money for most everything else, and this measure furnishes a worthy object.

Speaking for myself, I am in favor of making an appropriation large enough to make the Agricultural Department efficient.

Who can tell but that this Department, when fully equipped, can procure in this and other countries information on agriculture, animal industry, forestry, and kindred subjects which will enable our people to enhance the quality and quantity of their products, as well as cheapen labor by improved methods and machinery? May not this Department procure new and improved varieties of plants and seeds, which will enable us to diversify our crops? May it not make test of the adaptation of soil and climate to the growth of vegetation? When we consider what has been done, who can tell what is yet in store for us?

Mr. HATCH. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD].

Mr. LAIRD. I am delighted to see so many gentlemen with their sleeves rolled up, ready to do a hard day's work for the farmer. The trouble with the farmer, from his standpoint, I fancy, is that he has had his affairs too long in the hands of gentlemen who imagined they were better able to attend to his business than he was himself. I realize, speaking for the section I represent, that it has an extraordinary interest in the fact that seven millions of people who attempt to make a living and get happiness out of the ground are unrepresented in the center of political power in this country; and that, in defiance of the fact that from the man who shoes your horse to the carpenter who builds your house, from the carpenter who builds your house to the doctor who cures your ailments and to the preacher who tries to save your soul, the proposition holds true that you deliver over the tools of life into the hands of the men who know best how to use them.

It is a notorious fact that until the passage of the Hatch bill agriculture as a great productive interest has never been represented directly in the councils of the country; has never had a half million dollars bestowed upon it. It is the industry from which flows the daily life of the nation, and yet anybody who cares to be conversant with the facts knows that it has been treated very differently in this country from what is the case in Russia, Italy, Sweden, France, Germany, and Austria, whose governments pour out millions for the benefit of agriculture and have this department of industry represented in their cabinets.

Mr HATCH. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] has said much better than I can what was in my mind. But I want to say in answer to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] that the State and National Governments have organized bureaus at great expense for the purpose of giving commercial men, if not speculators, in advance, accounts of the prospects of the differents kinds of crops, in order that they may speculate therein to a greater or less extent. Now, if the Government does that for the men who are buying and selling, much more ought it to give the farmer, by every possible means, the information it can get as to the probable state of the weather. Thousands of dollars can be profitably spent in this direction, so that the farmers of this country may know in advance, as far as possible, just what to anticipate. And this service should be under the control of that Department which by this bill we hope to create—a Department with a Cabinet minister at its head whose time and talents shall be devoted to those interests that feed and clothe every human being.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HATCH. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN].

Mr. RYAN. I am heartily in favor of this measure precisely as it is reported. I have no time to discuss the merits of this bill. I am in favor of the creation of the department, because I think the greatest industry of this country should be more closely allied with the Federal Administration. All the interests of agriculture could then be more thoroughly represented in executive council, and information in regard to them could be more fully and intelligently presented to the Congress of the United States by the President in his annual message.

As regards the Weather Bureau, which is one of the most important adjuncts of agriculture that we have, it should be under the Agricultural Department, as the bill provides, whether the Department remains a bureau or becomes an executive department of the Government. The Signal Service proper ought not to be connected with the Weather Bureau, but should be left to the Army of the United States, of which it is a necessary part, as this bill contemplates.

Once you create an executive Department of Agriculture, its chief becomes a member of the Cabinet. This brings this great national industry directly under the charge and responsibility of the President. The very importance and magnitude of such a trust must necessarily make the Chief Magistrate solicitous regarding all the interests and conditions of agriculture. These considerations and interests must almost weekly become the subjects of Cabinet consideration and discussion. Whatever injustice this supreme industry may suffer from iniquitous combinations, from transportation extortions, from oppressive legislation, or from any other cause, must inevitably become the subject at once of Executive and Cabinet solicitude, of thorough and anxious consideration by the head of the nation, whose duty it will be to lay before Congress from time to time all the facts, with such suggestions and recommendations as in his wisdom he may deem important. This will bring Congress face to face with the whole subject and impose directly upon it the responsibility of just action. This bill ought to pass without a dissenting vote.

Mr. HATCH. I demand the yeas and nays on my motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 236, nays 13, not voting 75; as follows:

On motion of Mr. HATCH, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names of members voting was dispensed with.

Mr. STAHLNECKER. Mr. Speaker, I am informed that I am paired with the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. STEWART] on all political questions, but, considering this not to be a political question, and believing that the gentleman from Vermont, if present, would vote as I do, I desire to have my vote recorded in the affirmative.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. COWLES with Mr. FITCH, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. CRAIN with Mr. CUTCHEON.

Mr. COMPTON with Mr. KELLEY.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Speaker, I now renew the motion which I made earlier in the day, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills. I trust that gentlemen will see the wisdom of this course. The committee which I represent has a bill which might be called up and passed under a suspension of the rules, but we waive that course for the present, and under the instruction of the committee I make the motion that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment it is too late to enter into the consideration of an appropriation bill, and therefore I think we had better proceed with the regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. Not at all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from New York——

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, in view of some things which have been said here, I hope I may be allowed to say that there are four or five other appropriation bills in the Committee of the Whole, and that we are getting pretty near to the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Speaker, let me add that we can finish the bill this evening.

The motion of Mr. BELMONT was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. TOWNSHEND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of general appropriation bills. The Clerk will report the title of the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6833) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year 1889.

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Chairman, I regret that the Committee on Foreign Affairs has found it necessary under the rules to report a bill which contains no change of existing law. We have been in receipt of many communications from consuls and diplomatic officers, as well as from the Department of State, which, under other circumstances, would have required us to recommend some important changes for the benefit of the service; but we are confronted with a rule which binds us to such an extent that the House now has before it a bill which is practically a re-enactment of last year's appropriation bill. The House is of course familiar with the rule, but for the benefit of others interested, who are not, I will ask to incorporate it. It is as follows:

Rule XXI, paragraph 3:

"No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order in any amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto."

Under this rule it only remains for me to ask to have the Clerk perform the clerical duty of reading through the bill in the ordinary way. I know that there is no member of the committee who desires to speak upon it. I have only to say that proposed important changes in the consular service have been considered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and are embodied in another bill which we shall ask the House to consider on some future occasion.

Not only is the present bill exactly in accordance with last year's bill, but the amounts appropriated in it are the same, with the exception of a decrease of $16,077.44, provided last year for the Venezuela and Haytian Commissions, which are not now needed. There are a few verbal changes necessary, which I shall ask the Committee of the Whole to make as we proceed with the consideration of the bill. I now move that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BELMONT. I now ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the bill be read by sections under the five-minute rule.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Foreign Affairs considered this bill very carefully; and I had the honor to be a member of the subcommittee which had it especially under consideration. It is true, as stated by the chairman of the committee [Mr. BELMONT], that the bill, with the amendments which he intends to offer, will be in exact accordance with the bill passed by the House at the last session. We endeavored in committee to make this bill conform in every respect to the present law and to the bill passed at the last session. I make this statement with the view of facilitating and hastening the passage of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the general debate will be dispensed with, and the Clerk will proceed to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment, under the five-minute rule.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONTINGENT EXPENSES FOREIGN MISSIONS.

For the purpose of enabling the President to provide, at the public expense, all such stationery, blanks, record and other books, seals, presses, flags, and signs as he shall think necessary for the several legations in the transaction of their business, and also for rent, postage, telegrams, furniture, messenger service, clerk-hire, compensation of cavasses, guards, dragomans, and porters, including compensation of interpreter, guards, and Arabic clerk at the consulate at Tangier, and the compensation of dispatch agents at London, New York, and San Francisco, and for traveling and miscellaneous expenses of legations, and for printing in the Department of State, $105,000.

Mr. BELMONT. I move to amend by inserting after the word "dragomans," in line 92, the word "janitors."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the President to meet unforeseen emergencies arising in the diplomatic and consular service, and to extend the commercial and other interests of the United States, to be expended pursuant to the requirements of section 291 of the Revised Statutes, $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. DINGLEY. In order to put a question to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT] I move to strike out the last word. I wish to inquire whether there is any appropriation in this bill for the expenses of the Fishery Commission.

Mr. BELMONT. There is no specific appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is this appropriation for the secret-service fund one which will be available for that purpose?

Mr. BELMONT. It might be so considered, but there is nothing in the bill which would carry that intention. The money is to be expended in accordance with section 291 of the Revised Statutes, a provision with which the gentleman from Maine is no doubt familiar. This can hardly be said to be a secret-service fund; it is simply a fund placed at the disposal of the Department of State in the same manner as we have done hitherto. But I am not able to say that it is for the purpose of paying salaries or any portion of the expenses of the commission referred to.

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not observe in this bill any specific appropriation for the payment of the gentlemen who represented the United States upon the Fishery Commission. I observe that in the British Parliament a specific appropriation for the payment of the British commissioners was made with great éclat. I had supposed that provision for the payment of our commissioners might be included in this appropriation. I understand from the chairman of the committee that, though there is no specific provision, such compensation may be drawn from the fund here provided.

Mr. BELMONT. That may be possible, but it may be inferred that the gentlemen who served as commissioners were not so zealous about the question of salary as they were in their desire to be of service to the country.

Mr. DINGLEY. I had supposed the committee might make specific provision for the payment of these commissioners.

Mr. BELMONT. No such specific provision was made.

Mr. DINGLEY. But you think these expenses might be paid from this appropriation?

Mr. BELMONT. I think it possible, but I have no information on the subject.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is all I wish to say. I simply desired to get information. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For defraying the expenses of transporting the remains of ministers and consuls of the United States who may have died, or may die, abroad, while in the discharge of their official duties, to their former homes in this country, and for the ordinary and necessary expenses of such interment, $10,000.

Mr. BELMONT. In accordance with the desire of the accounting officers of the Treasury, I move to amend, by striking out, in line 145, the words "and consuls," and inserting the words "diplomatic officers, consuls, and consular clerks;" so as to read, "ministers, diplomatic officers, consuls, and consular clerks."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Great Britain and British dominions:

Consuls at Amherstburg (Canada), Antigua (West Indies), Auckland (New Zealand), Barbadoes, Bermuda, Bristol, Brockville (Canada), Cape Town, Ceylon (India), Charlottetown (Prince Edward Island), Clifton (Canada), Fort Erie (Canada), Goderich (Canada), Gibraltar, Guelph (Canada), Kingston (Canada), Leicester, London (Canada), Malta, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Quebec, Picton (Canada), Port Hope (Canada), Port Sarnia (Canada), Port Stanley (Falkland Islands), Prescott (Canada), Southampton, Saint Helena, Saint John's (Canada), Saint Stephen (Canada), Stanbridge (Canada), Stratford (Canada), Three Rivers (Canada), Windsor (Canada), and Winnipeg (Manitoba).

Mr. BELMONT. I move to amend by striking out, in line 303, the word "Leicester," which has been left in by inadvertence. Leicester is now a consular agency, paid by fees. In the bill as originally drafted it was proposed to make it a salaried consulate, but as this would be a change of existing law, it is stricken out.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BELMONT. In order to correct a similar inadvertence, I move to amend by striking out, in lines 307 and 308, the words "Stanbridge (Canada)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Barmen, Belfast, Dundee, Halifax, Leith, and Matamoras, at $640 each, $4,480.

Mr. BELMONT. I move to amend by striking out "and" after "Leith" and inserting after the word "Matamoras" the words "and Victoria." There is already a clerk provided for at Victoria, and this omission has happened merely through inadvertence.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to return to line 28 on page 2 for the purpose of making an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. Let us first hear what it is.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is an amendment which will not involve any expenditure at all. I desire to strike out, in line 28, the words "ministers resident," and insert the words "envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary." This change will cost nothing at all, but will have the effect of giving to our ministers resident an increased dignity and rank. Every gentleman who has been abroad knows that in all foreign countries our representatives suffer by reason of the inferior rank which their country gives them. As the governments to which these ministers resident are accredited send ministers plenipotentiary to our Government it will cost nothing to give our representatives similar rank; and I see no reason why it should not be done. I therefore desire to move an amendment (which will involve no increase of expense whatever), striking out the words "ministers resident" and inserting the words "envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary." I make this proposition with the consent of the chairman of the committee and of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], a member of the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] will not insist on this amendment. It is simply laying a foundation for increased salaries.

Mr. SPRINGER. Not at all. I assure my friend it has nothing at all to do with salaries.

Mr. HOLMAN. It must have an effect in that direction.

Mr. SPRINGER. Oh, no.

Mr. RANDALL. The mere change of title will not do these officers any good.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is where my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] does not understand diplomatic affairs. I refer him for information on this subject to the distinguished gentleman who at this moment sits behind him, Mr. Curtin, recently a Representative in this House, and who, having been at one time a foreign minister, could, if now permitted to speak on this floor, tell the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that it makes a great deal of difference whether our minister to a foreign country is accredited as a minister resident or as an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary.

Mr. RANDALL. My sympathies run in the direction of the consuls rather than in favor of the diplomatic representatives.

Mr. SPRINGER. My sympathies run in favor of both classes of officers. There is where I have the advantage over my friend. I think it important that we should be represented in foreign countries by ministers of equal rank with the representatives which they send here. I have received information from one of our ministers resident abroad to the effect that it frequently happens when our minister appears at court to transact public business he has to wait in the ante-room until the minister of Nicaragua, for instance, has had a hearing.

Mr. RANDALL. There appears to be no real necessity for this change.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX].

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. I believe the amendment is not before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not if objection is made.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope there will be no objection to hearing my friend from New York [Mr. COX].

Mr. RANDALL and Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection, the gentleman from New York will proceed.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is on the right track, but he does not go far enough. He should also strike out from this bill the high-sounding sesquipedalian words "envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary," and insert the simple and constitutional word "embassador." He would thus succeed in crystallizing a capital idea.

The embassadors of the great powers of Europe are the diplomatic representatives who always have precedence in all audiences for business or ceremony. Even if we call our "ministers resident" "envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary" they will, under the old and senseless rule of international practice, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] well suggests, made by the Holy Alliance after the fall of Napoleon, be nevertheless constrained always to defer to and wait for the embassadors. I have been asked unexpectedly to speak to this matter.

I can speak from not a little experience. Our minister to Turkey until within a few years was a minister resident only. He had to take rank after envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary. He had to wait in the ante-room not only until the embassadors but the envoys were received. No matter how urgent his business, he had to await the etiquette which left him out in the cold.

This mode of proceeding and preference was peculiarly irksome and humiliating to my predecessor, General Wallace, and to his predecessors. Afterwards, during the term of his service—General Wallace, who was when appointed only "minister resident" to Turkey—Congress struck out minister resident for the Sublime Porte and put in envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary. This was some advancement. It was quite a comfort and a relief, but still there remained the precedence of the embassadors, and the envoy had still to defer to the embassadors.

When, as envoy, etc., I went to the Porte to call on the foreign minister it was always on a Monday. That day was set apart for the diplomatic calls for business. Being only an envoy, and although my name was registered ahead of the embassadors, I was compelled to wait as soon as one of these highly-favored diplomats appeared, until Austria, England, France, Russia, Germany, Persia, and Italy, whose diplomats at Constantinople are called embassadors, went first and foremost. There was no chance for America until the monarchies were regarded. The minister of poor little Persia—a mere dependency or khanate of the White Bear of the North—took precedence of our country of sixty millions of people. Why? Because the Persian minister, like those of the great powers, was called "embassador!"

Mr. Chairman, this inconvenience and degradation should be remedied. How? As it is a mere matter of verbiage and form, what matter is it what we call our diplomatic functionary? The simplest title is the best and most republican in form and fact. That title is embassador. It is named in our Constitution. It means a minister of the highest rank. What do we care as a nation about "rank." Rank is but the stamp, not the man or the officer, or functionary. Are we not entitled to the same rank as every other power? Is it wise, since we want to advance our interests in the East and elsewhere, to adopt the less pretentious name when another name will obtain for us greater advantages? It is the same at the other courts of Europe. When the accredited ministers are named embassadors, the chambers of courtesy and power fly open to this "open sesame." They thereby obtain the entré before mere envoys, or ministers resident, or chargé d'affaires, and more than an entré—a greater consideration and emphasis.

Mr. PETERS. Can we not coin a word to put us ahead?

Mr. COX. The word embassador has the charm, at least for the Orient, for it comes from an Oriental word which means "powerful," as Bassa, or Bashaw.

The reason why the United States has never created an embassador, except, perhaps, for special embassies, is this: By the treaty of the Holy Alliance, in the conspiracy against democratic republicanism, they agreed among themselves that no popular government should ever be recognized at their imperial courts and foreign offices if they came by and through an embassador. An embassador—oh, he represented a sovereign. He was vicariously in the place of one annointed of the Lord. He was specially dedicated to monarchy and absolutism. Republics should uncover their heads and stand outside with their chargés, ministers resident, and envoys, however extraordinary, until the Lord's annointed passed through the swelling scene.

Since the French Republic has been established its Government still continues to call its minister an embassador. If France can disregard the exclusive prescripts of the Holy Alliance why not the United States of America?

I do not know how this debate arose or whether any motion to amend is pending. I wish I had known that the matter was to be considered. I would have made a motion—and it would carry, too, if in order—to make all of our diplomats embassadors.

If we are to have our ministers respected, and in order to give them their proper status and dignity corresponding with our country's position among the powers of the earth, we ought to strike out the words envoy extraordinary, etc., and insert embassador. If the great powers do not like it let them do their worst. It is not such a great loss to be unrepresented abroad as we may surmise. Then our ministers abroad representing our growing interests, if we must have them, will have precedence of the little powers, which generally have ministers of a lower grade, and be the equals of those who are of a higher rank without representing grander nations.

Why, sir, the representative of Servia, Roumania, Greece, Sweden, Belgium, or Holland, or of any of these smaller nations, can at any time, by calling their diplomats "embassador," do as little Persia did at the Porte—step in, although arriving late, ahead of our envoy "extra-ordinary." Why should we, because a Republic, be bound to make our salaam before Russia, Germany, or England, by the ridiculous rules of the Holy Alliance, to which we never consented and as to which we were never consulted. Although when minister to Turkey I used to be on time and in advance of others, I was compelled to wait and to wait in an ante-room of the Porte, the pleasure of these excellencies of the monarchies and empires, with the thermometer going up beyond the nineties, from 12 o'clock to sunset. [Laughter.] Then sometimes, without having accomplished my work, I was compelled to leave. I used to wait patiently, because I had important duties with the foreign minister. I always gave way to those of similar or less rank, when they had urgent business, if they happened in after my "registry." The "embassadors," however, did not always return the courtesy.

When the embassadors arrived they wrote down their names on the list, and the waters of the pool were at once stirred for them, and they stepped in ahead of the representatives of the United States. There was not a little disgust along with humiliation at seeing a little power like modern Persia—a petty colony on the borders of Armenia, India, and Russia, a travesty on ancient Persia and government generally—take precedence of my own native land, even though so poorly represented as by myself. To speak confidentially, I believe it was one of the reasons why I yearned for home and for my old place here, to enjoy the equal and genial society of this elegant assembly of gentlemen. [Laughter and applause.]

I wish all this ceremonial nonsense could be changed—for my successor and for our other envoys extraordinary. I think that our Secretary of State would favor the change if it were properly presented to him in a republican and a business point of view by one who has suffered, like Minister Phelps.

I have only spoken for Turkey. The humiliation is worse at the court of St. James. Our ministers feel the indignity, if they do not express their indignation.

Any embassador could care better for the fifteen millions of property of our country invested in the Turkish dominions if our interests were in charge of an embassador. Our missionaries and colleges and teachers, printing houses, etc., scattered all over that empire from Bagdad to Stamboul, from Albania and Macedonia to the Adriatic and the Danube, would have more protection afforded them under the superior offices of an embassador than of a mere envoy, however extraordinary, or a minister, however plenipotential!

Our interests in that country are spreading. Our sentiments are permeating that empire. They are doing practical good. They have republicanized Bulgaria and are leavening East Roumelia. They are by force of education and example creating American institutions. Our preachers and teachers are often in great distress when persecution and oppression fall on them, whether from the jealousy of the Greek Christians or the Armenian bigots. Their schools are closed, from envy and distrust of their growth and utility, by the clamors of other religionists, who are not Mohammedans either. Our colporteurs of tracts in many tongues are often suppressed and their property seized in spite of "capitulations" and treaties, and especially when they are remote from the capital and central power. Our missionaries and teachers, of both sexes, have been robbed and outraged by tramps and brigands, and with little hope of relief or reclamation. And here, sir, is just exactly where the rank and services of an embassador, or rather those of an envoy with a big affix, enable our representative to meet more speedily and effectually the minister of foreign affairs for the purpose of a prompt rectification of the abuses incident to these Oriental countries.

Now, sir, I did not expect at this time to talk on this subject; and I would not have spoken but for the call of gentlemen who seemed to be so interested in the matter.

Mr. DINGLEY. Before the gentleman from New York takes his seat I would like to ask him a question for information.

Mr. COX. Certainly, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the change proposed by the gentleman, which of course would be a change of law, giving the name of "embassador" in these countries, or "minister plenipotentiary," should be adopted, would it not carry with it certainly, by way of emolument, an increase of compensation?

Mr. COX. That is the argument that has hitherto been made against the suggested change. It was made by my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. It is not well grounded. It could be guarded against by proper provision from the committee.

But let me say to my honorable friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] that when we raised the rank of the minister at Turkey from "minister resident" to "envoy," etc., it did not by force of existing law, raise the salary of that officer. We may fix the salary in this and similar bills of appropriation. The mere change of the title or rank of the diplomatist does not of necessity work a change or increase of compensation. Such change depends altogether upon the action of Congress, and not by a mere change of the rank or title. This is as I understand it.

Mr. DINGLEY. But is there any minister plenipotentiary who receives now less than ten, twelve, or seventeen thousand dollars a year? while the ministers resident receive but $7,500, I believe.

Mr. COX. Let me say——

Mr. DINGLEY. And, therefore, it would seem that officers having the same rank should receive the same compensation.

Mr. COX. That does not and should not follow. We do not pay for rank, but for service. I would not advocate the raising of the salary simply because we saw proper to change or raise the rank. The salary should be regulated by the utility of the minister at the place assigned, by the business of his office, instead of by the rank which he holds. At some of the countries of South America and at the courts of Asia, as Japan and China, we have enormous business relations. They grow out of our commerce. The compensation of such ministers should be fixed upon a different basis from that granted to our ministers, even if of the same rank, at Holland, Greece, Denmark, Portugal, or other small countries where we have no possible complications, and very few interests; or such interests as our consuls might attend to in the absence of a minister. The salary should be correspondingly low in such cases. It should be raised according to the interests involved and the duties to be done.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, and in order to make my ideas more perspicuous, may I be allowed to draw upon a description of my own experience, recorded in a volume called "The Diversions of a Diplomat?" It is not without reluctance that I quote from my own humble writings, but the unexpected interest excited by this chance discussion, and the call upon me for some statement, give me the courage to print here what may be read with more interest than these desultory remarks. Besides, since this bill goes to the Senate without the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] as to raising the ministers resident to envoys, and without the amendment I suggested of raising envoys to ambassadors, or raising all our diplomats to embassadors, I crave the liberty to insert some paragraphs from my volume, pertinent to this debate, as more expressive of my observation and experience:

It is not a very great diversion; nevertheless, when one becomes reminiscent it becomes amusing to recognize that so much depends, in Europe and elsewhere, upon the name, the title, the decoration or the rank of people who come and go, both as officers, diplomats, and otherwise. Let me give an illustration.

For many years the office of minister to Turkey from the United States was simply that of minister resident. That made him third in the list of diplomatic personages at the various courts; the first being an embassador, the second being an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, the third being minister resident, and the fourth being chargé d'affaires. When General Wallace began his services in Turkey in 1881 he was simply a minister resident. Perhaps it irked the author of "Ben Hur" greatly to know that while he could soar, as few men of genius can, into the hierarchy of literature, and dwell among the princes of earth, or revel in the Valhalla with the great ones of the Elder Day, while in gorgeous and glowing imagery he could depict Oriental scenes with rarest skill, learning, and dramatic power; still, as minister, he had to wait, upon every official occasion, and in all the various phases of Oriental etiquette, while some envoy from a little state, or some swell of an embassador from an effete dynasty, took precedence of the representative of many millions of progressive and free people. I will not say that he ever complained of this inversion of official and personal dignity, although when I was in Constantinople in 1881, he did use some democratic-republican forms of speech which I thought proper and pertinent. To these I have added some of my own vehemence since, growing out of my own experience. I happened to be one of the legislators who helped to raise General Wallace's rank from minister resident to that of envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary. It was done to add one step to his rank; but it was not enough, as the sequel will show.

Now, one would suppose that a man who is entitled to such magnificent and unabridged-dictionary titles as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary ought to take precedence of certain representatives at the court of the Sultan who were representing inferior states.

I had occasion to feel this one sultry afternoon in the month of August, 1886. Along with the dragoman, Mr. Gargiulo, I call on the minister of foreign affairs, Said Pasha, at the Porte. It is on Monday, when all the various diplomats are received. We are accustomed to record our names on our entrée to the reception-room. My arrival is timely; my name is first on the list as an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary.

It is 2 o'clock in the afternoon and the thermometer is 90°. I mop the perspiration from my brow, and am about to be ushered into the presence of the foreign minister, when lo! Monsieur Nellidoff, the Russian embassador, appears all aglow with heat and all agrowl like the bear of the north. By virtue of his being an embassador he makes his courtesy, takes precedence, and goes in. Then comes a minister resident from Greece. I have precedence of him, of course, as being an envoy, but as he has some distance to go this afternoon up the Bosphorus, I politely yield my place to him. Thus passes away about an hour, the thermometer trembling at 91° and the perspiration running in canals from my corrugated brow. I am about to congratulate myself that my time has come, when a polite and facile gentleman, the French minister, Count de Montholon, a connection of La Fayette, with partialities toward our country and representing a republic, appears. He is registered, he passes in, and the envoy from America, a republic which antedates his, still remains outside. The thermometer is still rising somewhere among the nineties. The four thousand pores to the square inch on the cuticle of the envoy pour forth their beaded drops. The count, who is very polite when he arrives, remarks: "I am quite in a hurry, excellence! You will be detained but a few moments."

He stays about an hour. As I have to go to the Island of Prinkipo this afternoon, and am rather loath to test the sultriness which sometimes brings storms over the old Propontis, I become quite uneasy and begin to perspire freely at 92°, and to go over in my mind the advantage of being an embassador, when Herr Radowitz, the German embassador, with his pleasant smile and shining spectacles, peeps in, after making his registry and the courtesies, and "Sorry to take precedence of the American minister," he enters in. The thermometer begins to rage fiercely at 93°, and the perspiration is as fluent as the Bosporus. I knew that he would not stay long. The representative of "The Honest Broker," as Germany has been called, soon dispatches his business, to my great relief. Five o'clock is shown upon the clock, with the thermometer still rising and the sweat still falling, when—but I can not swear—when lo! the deaf-mute, who still hovers around Oriental courts and Portes, appears.

He makes his signs and gives his orders as an "unspeakable Turk" in his ineffable way, smiling over the prospect of my now being reached in order, and over the backsheech at the end of my long experience with the thermometer and the embassadors, when lo! the embassador from Persia is announced! Meshallah! He takes precedence, of course. Is he not known as His Excellency Marshal Mirza Mohsin Khan? C-A-N is the way to spell it, with capital letters; for he goes in. He is accompanied by his cousin, who is also quite a dignitary of the legation; and without saying "by your leave," or looking at the list, the thermometer, or the clock, or making apology or inquiry as to my forbearance, they, too, have entered into the penetralia! The thermometer by this time is near bursting. As he passes in he remarks, coolly: "I will be only five minutes, Excellence!" I know the Marshal Mirza Mohsin Khan well. He is a good Mahometan, and he has many relations with the Porte which do not belong to the outside world. I anticipate his long conversation with the minister.

After waiting until about 6 o'clock, the shades of evening begin to fall, and the thermometer with them. I gaze into the big black eyes of the dragoman, give one sigh for my far-off country, cast one long look out of the window over the old Saraglio Point, think over its sanguinary scenes, and, while wiping my anxious brow, I indicate to that patient interpreter that if the embassador of a little, miserable, half-fed dependency of Russia, known as the Khanate of Persia, may take precedence of an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, representing a nation of sixty million of independent freemen, I wanted to go home. I went. I made a solemn resolution that if I ever entered the American Congress again, I would move to strike out the grand six-footed words to which our minister is accredited to the Porte, and insert the simple word "Embassador." It is the magical word to the jewels and gold of Oriental diplomacy.

But can a republic have an embassador? That is the momentous question. It was settled by the Holy Alliance and some other powers confederating that only monarchial governments could have embassadors. Republics were then forbidden to have other than ministers or envoys. This is a solemn treaty among the powers, but at that meeting we were not present and not consulted; and then, too, France was a monarchy. She is now a republic. She holds on to the embassador with all its advantages. Why should not we have the same? If titles have any value, let us use the best in the lexicon.

There is room for reform in the diplomatic service. In fact it might be abolished altogether where the telegraph can play its part for special embassies and emergent occasions. What a solemn farce it is after all, for an American minister to pretend to any style or rank, when he can not do as other ministers, conclude any treaty or anything so as to bind any one. The making and confirming of conventions by our Constitution depends on the Executive or his Secretary of State, and then absolutely upon the Senate. The minister is powerless for good except in a few remote countries like China, Japan, and Turkey, and in certain cases like the very ones I was waiting to conclude when the other powers step before me into the agitated pool at the Porte. What I mean is this: That for over ten years two treaties accomplished by this country with Turkey have been suspended at the Porte. They had been made by Mr. Minister Boker, signed and already confirmed by the Senate.

Our country was anxious for them. They were in accord with the American doctrines of expatriation and naturalization. They were a triumph of the right of locomotion and the liberalities of our time. By the special iradé of the Sultan, and after great trouble, vexation, patience, and delay, the ex-minister, who writes this chapter, succeeded in securing, by the Sultan's favorable interposition, the acquiescence of the Porte with these treaties. It was supposed to be a finality. Have they been consummated now by our Chief Executive or his Secretary of State? No; and inasmuch as they illustrate a line of honorable progress in diplomacy, secured by a subordinate and remote official, they are now regarded, since their acceptance by Turkey, as of little or no moment! We prize little that which we obtain, after it is obtained, or which others have secured, even though secured under specific instructions. Of this hereafter, and in another forum than the republic of letters.

If this be the end of such labors under such favorable circumstances, better make an end of all such fruitless and salaried diplomatic intercourse!

Mr. BELMONT. While the House is engaged in this discussion I think it proper to say that the Committee on Foreign Affairs has carefully considered the proposition to increase the rank of our minister in London to that of embassador, under a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON]. It did not appear to the committee, if I may be allowed to speak for them, that it was wise to make any change in London alone, for reasons which might apply with equal force to other diplomatic posts. Whatever arguments may be presented in favor of raising the rank of our missions and the creation of American embassies, there is another phase of the question, and one usually but little thought of, that is, the receiving of foreign embassadors in this country. If we send embassadors abroad we must prepare to receive embassadors here.

If such a course were pursued it would entirely change the character of the diplomatic representation in Washington. Under the rules established by the Congress of Vienna, in 1813, completed at Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1818, and formally assented to by the United States, four grades of diplomatic representation were established: First, embassadors; second, envoys; third, ministers resident, and fourth, chargés d'affaires. If I understand rightly the proposition of my colleague from New York [Mr. COX], he would make all our ministers abroad embassadors. This would require, under the rules of international etiquette, that every country which now has representation in the Diplomatic Corps in Washington should send to the United States a minister of the same rank as the United States accredited. Consequently only embassadors would be sent to Washington. I need hardly say this would be almost absurd.

Embassadors in the earlier days of diplomacy were understood to represent the person of the sovereign, and were received with a certain amount of ceremonial honors. This has been changed in part. Embassadors, no longer even in theory, are supposed to deal directly with the sovereign. They, as well as ministers of lower rank, now transact their business through the foreign offices. Still, there are some ceremonial observances connected with the rank which are yet maintained, and which would be a source of considerable embarrassment here in Washington if the plan outlined by my colleague were carried into effect.

It would be a more dignified and proper course, in my opinion, for the United States, if it is considered well to do anything at all in reference to the matter, of which I have some doubt, to propose that there should be a modification of the rules established by the Congress of Vienna, so as to simplify and reduce the number of diplomatic grades, thus establishing an actual instead of a theoretical equality between sovereign States.

The proposition advanced by many publicists is that there should be but two grades, one corresponding to the minister plenipotentiary or minister resident, all to be designated by the same title, which would convey with it the idea which my friend from New York [Mr. COX] has presented to the House, that is to say, an embassadorial representative; and the other to be simply charges d'affaires. A resolution might be passed, asking that initial steps be taken with other nations for a revision of the rules. But it must be important for Congress to consider the fact that if we send embassadors we must be prepared to receive them here in Washington, and, as I have said, it would make a great change in the present diplomatic corps.

Mr. COX. Let me ask my friend this question. If the treaty of Vienna, he calls it—I think it was Paris——

Mr. BELMONT. No, it was the Congress of Vienna that established the rules, which were completed at Aix-la-Chapelle in 1818.

Mr. COX. Very well; if that treaty limited embassadors only to monarchical governments, why is it, and that is the next question, since France has become a republic, that they still keep up the embassadorial rank there? They have made no change since they became a republic. Why should we not do the same thing?

Mr. BELMONT. I will repeat that writers on international law are pointing out the fact that the distinction between embassadors and envoys extraordinary is growing less and less from day to day; and it is for that reason it is proposed in some quarters to have a revision of the rules.

It is quite true the distinction is obsolete. Originally, as I have said, embassadors were assumed to represent the person of the sovereign. That, of course, is no longer the case, as my friend from New York has stated. France, a republic, sends an embassador to Switzerland, another republic.

If we want to take a step that is progressive, we might very properly call upon the Executive to inaugurate some conference on the subject. But so long as the rules of Vienna exist this distinction between embassador and envoy will be continued, and in some cases to our detriment. I have known, however, cases where an American minister refused to submit to any such discrimination in the transaction of his business with the foreign office. For instance, Mr. Bancroft, in Berlin, when he called on the minister of foreign affairs, being obliged to wait because of the arrival of the British embassador, returned to his residence and made it known to the foreign office that he would not transact the business of the United States unless he was received as other ministers; and the rule in that case was changed.

A similar change of rule was brought about in like manner in Holland. In Russia the foreign office has for some time observed the plan of receiving ministers in their order of arrival, irrespective of their rank.

I only mention these cases in order to show that there is reason to believe that a revision of these rules might be brought about, and that this course would be much preferable for the United States.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the Constitution of the United States permits the President to appoint embassadors if he sees fit.

Mr. BELMONT. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. And it is then for Congress to appropriate the money. But to change the title is, in my judgment, the first step towards an increase of pay.

Mr. COX. That was not the result when we raised ministers resident to envoys extraordinary.

Mr. RANDALL. It either means increased pay or it is a mere tinsel title of which the American citizen stands in no need.

Mr. COX. It means something else than a mere title. It means the transaction of business; when you have to wait for a dozen people not half so important as you are.

Mr. RANDALL. The dignity of a representative of the American Government commands respect at all these places, and I have near me at this moment a gentleman [ex-Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania] who corroborates that statement.

Mr. COX. That depends on one thing. The result of sticking to the old etiquette is that no man with a different title can get ahead of embassadors.

Mr. RANDALL. I would either go ahead or go away and let them send for me.

Mr. COX. In that case I would abolish the whole system.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] opposing this reform, I withdraw my amendment. The responsibility for its failure will rest upon those gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no question pending.

Mr. BELMONT. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the amendments.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. COX. I would like to have the privilege of printing a little statement on this matter in a better shape, that the Senate may take notice of it.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will give it better shape. [Laughter.]

There was no objection to the request of Mr. COX.

DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next general appropriation bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8989) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I deem it wholly unnecessary to take the time of the committee in general debate upon this bill. I simply state that it carries about $226,000 more than the bill of last year. This is mostly owing to the increase of school buildings and to increased appropriations for the improvement and repair of streets.

I do not wish to take the time for any further explanation of the bill, but will be glad to explain its provisions as we go on. Therefore I ask, if no member of the committee desires to speak, that we consider general debate as closed.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed to read the bill by paragraphs for amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Seventeenth street from Q to R street, $155,748.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all after the word "street," in line 7, and all of line 8, and insert after line 7, "Corcoran street from Fifteenth to Sixteenth street, $160,924."

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Should not that be from Fifteenth to Seventeenth street? It should be, according to my memorandum.

Mr. McCOMAS. Yes, that is correct. That covers the whole gap.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I move to amend the amendment of my colleague [Mr. CLEMENTS] so as to make it read "from Fifteenth to Seventeenth street."

Mr. CLEMENTS. Then you must change the amount.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I think the amount does not require to be changed.

Mr. McCOMAS. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CLEMENTS] will find that the House will assent to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia accept the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. CLEMENTS. I do.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

D street southeast (north side), from Pennsylvania avenue to Eighth street; South Carolina avenue southeast, from Seventh street to Pennsylvania avenue;

Seventh street southeast, from D street to South Carolina avenue; $27,784.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting on page 10, at the end of line 25, "$22,500;" and on page 11, by striking out from lines 1 to 5 inclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To grade and pave Chapin street from Fourteenth street extended to Wayland Seminary, $2,500;

To pave Stoughton street, $2,500.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, when the committee prepared the bill we had no estimate as to what the cost of paving Stoughton street would be, but we examined the street and determined to put $2,500 into the bill for that purpose. Subsequently an examination was made by one of the District officers, and it was found that it would require $7,000 to put Stoughton street in proper condition. In this connection I desire to have read a letter which I have received from Professor King, of the Wayland Seminary, which is situated at the head of Stoughton street.

The letter was read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 11, 1888.

Hon. D. B. HENDERSON:

I wish to put in a plea to have an appropriation made to so improve Chapin street, Meridian Hill, that it can be used during all seasons of the year to bring supplies to our seminary. During the winter months it is impossible for our supplies to come to us through the deep mud that abounds in this street.

The institution holds property valued at about $100,000; this amount has been contributed by the benevolent of the land.

Congress has never helped us by an appropriation.

The school educates the poorest class among our citizens. We send colored teachers and colored preachers wherever their people are found.

This year we have had one hundred and sixty students.

The benevolent from all parts of the country sustain the work.

Is it a wonder that we desire to see Chapin street, at the head of which street our institution stands, well graded and paved?

The friends who have aided the school complain bitterly of the mud through which they must find us during the winter.

Very truly, yours,

G. M. P. KING.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in lines 11 and 12, page 13, by striking out $2,500 and inserting $7,000. This matter has not been before the committee, and I am offering this amendment on my own responsibility, upon information which has come to me since the bill was made up. This little block which is to be improved extends from Fourteenth street to the top of the hill, where this seminary stands. The citizens have improved about half the block at their own expense, and they have it in good condition. The $2 500 in the bill will not do the work, and it seems to me that if we are going into it at all it should be done properly, and that we should appropriate enough to do the work thoroughly to the top of the hill, which is what we had in contemplation.

Seven thousand dollars will do the work. I will say for the information of my colleague [Mr. CLEMENTS] that the District government sent the officer who has charge of making these improvements to examine this street and make an estimate, and the amount he fixed was $7,000.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I was just going to ask my colleague how he arrived at the probable cost of this work. It is true that this street was put into the bill without an estimate, but it was assumed that this amount of $2,500 would be sufficient, and I should like to know how my friend got the official information upon which he offers his amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Professor King and the petitioners on that street went to the District government and they sent the officer who makes the estimates—I have forgotten his name at this moment, but I think it was Captain Griffin—to make an estimate. I have his statement among my papers, but I can not lay my hand upon it at this instant. I have here a letter from one of the parties, stating that this officer did make the estimate, and later I can produce the officer's own estimate fixing the amount at $7,000.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to add to my amendment, on the suggestion of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN], after the word "dollars," the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I see that the appropriation in the bill for this street is $2,500.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Yes, sir; and this amendment is to increase this amount from $2,500 to $7,000.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that the last amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, adding the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary," will amount to anything, and his amendment substituting $7,000 for $2,500, when the committee, including the gentleman himself, estimated that $2,500 would be sufficient, seems to me to be unwise under the circumstances. Comparing this with other work, this seems to be a very great increase upon the amount estimated. I think we are going rather in the dark in making this appropriation, and that we had better stand by the amount in the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. My colleague on the committee [Mr. CLEMENTS] will allow me to call his attention to the fact that when we made up these appropriations we inserted this sum of $2,500 without any information as to the amount which would actually be required to do the work. He also knows that the work, as it is to be done on steep, rising ground, must be expensive. It was understood that these amounts were subject to change by amendments which might subsequently be offered. The estimate on which my amendment is based was made by an engineer upon careful examination.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I am aware that when the amount was inserted in the bill we had not full knowledge as to the character of the work; but $7,000 is so large an increase upon $2,500 that I hardly think we have gone so far out of the way. I do not feel well enough satisfied in that respect to assent to the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I think my colleague will concede that if we had had before us, when making up the bill, the estimate of $7,000 for this work, we would have agreed to it.

Mr. CLEMENTS. No doubt we would have given whatever the report of the proper District official showed to be necessary.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The amount named in my amendment is absolutely required.

The amendment of Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, was agreed to; there being—ayes 50, noes 27.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pave Stoughton street, $2,500.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. For the purpose of properly paving Stoughton street I believe an appropriation of $5,500 is required; but, although $2,500 is not sufficient, I will not press an amendment upon the House, as the reasons for an increase in this case are not so urgent as in that just now under consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

For salaries of superintendents, teachers, and janitors, secretary of the board, and clerks, including additional teachers, rents, repairs, fuel, furniture, books, stationery, new school buildings, furniture for new school buildings, and other necessary items, $842,195, namely:

For officers: For superintendent first six divisions, at $2,700; superintendent seventh and eighth divisions, at $2,250; one clerk to superintendent of first six divisions and secretary to board of trustees, $1,200; one clerk to superintendent of seventh and eighth divisions, $900; messenger to superintendent first six divisions, $300; messenger to superintendent seventh and eighth divisions, $300; in all, $7,450.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I move to strike out, in line 16, "$2,700," and insert "3,000;" so it will read:

For superintendent first six divisions, at $3,000.

I simply desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that——

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I make the point of order against the gentleman's amendment that the law has already fixed this salary.

The CHAIRMAN. If the law has fixed this salary the Chair will hold the point of order to be good.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. If there is any law fixing the salary I should like to see it produced.

Mr. CLEMENTS. This is the salary of this office year after year provided for in the various appropriation bills, and in that way it has been a fixed salary.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that even if there were no law fixing the salary—and I presume there is—if there were no other law but the law of the appropriation bill, the appropriation bill is the law for the current year and is the law now, and an amendment to increase the salary is a change of existing law, and therefore not in order. I think it has been so ruled uniformly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that unless there is a law produced fixing the salary of this officer the point of order is not good. An appropriation contained in an appropriation bill of a certain amount as salary is not, in the judgment of the Chair, such a law as will prevent the offering of an amendment of this character, and unless the gentleman can point out to the Chair a statute fixing this as the salary of this officer the Chair will be compelled to overrule the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is general legislation on an appropriation bill. It increases the appropriation. It is not merely an act of legislation on an appropriation bill, but it is a new law fixing $3,000 as the salary for this office for the next fiscal year. I do not think there is any precedent except one, which I never regarded as entitled to be referred to as a precedent, where it is held that if there is no law fixing a salary it may be increased without limit. The suggestion is against the whole rule of the House. In that event any law fixing a salary will allow of an increase of it without limit. It will allow such increase to be made every succeeding year.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. The gentleman has said nothing so far which in my opinion shakes the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless some statute is cited fixing this as the salary of this office the Chair must overrule the point of order. The mere fact that this has been provided as the salary for this office in an appropriation bill from year to year does not render the amendment obnoxious to the rule to which reference has been made.

Mr. HOLMAN. Such a ruling throws open this bill entirely.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless the word "hereafter" is employed, thereby fixing this as the salary not only for this year but for the future, making it a portion of the permanent law, it is not such a law as comes within the rule prohibiting amendment. In other words, the statute has not been cited where this salary is made a part of the permanent law. It is simply a provision in the appropriation bill appropriating that much for this salary from year to year.

Mr. SPRINGER. I agree with the Chair in its decision. It is only the existing law for the year for which the appropriation is made. The test of whether there is a law fixing a salary is this: In case no appropriation was made could the party go on and discharge the duties of the office, or would the failure to make the appropriation legislate him out of office?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the rule will be read; that is, the third clause of Rule XXI.

The language there in that rule requires that appropriations shall be made in conformity to law. There has therefore to be a law before we can make any appropriation at all. The only reason this appropriation is reported here is because it is in conformity with law. It is the only round upon which it stands.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. There is a law for this office, but there is no law fixing the salary of the office. That is left to be fixed by Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. That can be said of almost every office, the salaries of which are fixed by Congress from time to time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

By paragraph 3 of Rule XXI of the House of Representatives it is provided: "3. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order in any amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto."

Mr. HOLMAN. Nobody pretends to say under the circumstances this does not change existing law; that it is not in conformity with the law. The present law has fixed it at $2,700, and it is inserted in this bill in conformity with that law, otherwise it would not be here at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that if the appropriation is not made for the salary of this officer until the end of the fiscal year the office would be necessarily discontinued, and as has been intimated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] this officer, if he continued to perform the duties, would have no recourse upon the Government for the salary in the absence of any law providing for the payment.

It is the judgment of the Chair, therefore, that no law being presented which fixes the salary at the present limit, the amendment is in order, and the Chair so holds.

Mr. CLEMENTS. One word before the vote is taken. The estimates that were sent to the committee embraced propositions to increase a great many salaries; in fact, salaries all along the line of the District of Columbia officials and their employés. Amongst others an increase was asked for the superintendent of police, which salary is now fixed at $2,600, a very responsible office, quite as much so as the superintendent of the public schools; indeed, more so, in my judgment. There are two superintendents of public schools, one, for whom this amendment is offered, receiving $2,700 and the other $2,250. There is no greater reason for an increase of this salary than can be assigned for the increase of many others.

Mr. ROGERS. What did I understand the gentleman to say it was now, and for what office?

Mr. CLEMENTS. Twenty-seven hundred dollars for the superintendent of public schools.

Gentlemen say that this is inadequate as compared with other salaries, but we might draw the comparison on the other line by stating that there are in some of the States governors who do not receive so much.

Mr. HOLMAN. The surveyors of the public lands only receive $2,700.

Mr. BLOUNT. Let me ask my colleague if there is not good reason for an increase of all these salaries according to the statements of the incumbents?

Mr. CLEMENTS. I have not heard of any where the incumbents can not assign good reasons for an increase. I do not mean to criticise in any way the superintendent of public schools. He is an excellent and capable educator, and suitable in all respects for the place; but he is receiving, as I think, an adequate salary, and hence we object to the amendment.

Mr. HERBERT. How long has he been receiving this salary?

Mr. CLEMENTS. He has not been here very long, I believe.

Mr. HERBERT. How long has the salary been attached to the office?

Mr. CLEMENTS. For a great many years, ten or twelve at least. It was the salary when he accepted the position.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman, this is a proposition, as I understand it, to increase a salary that has been fixed by the appropriations for a number of years.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Yes; $2,700 is the salary that was fixed.

Mr. HERBERT. How far back; ten years?

Mr. CLEMENTS. I should say for ten years anyhow.

Mr. HERBERT. And during all these ten years the prices of everything have been falling greatly, until now we have reached a level of prices which has not existed here certainly since 1860. Most of the things we now live upon are cheaper than they ever were, and there is no sort of doubt that $2,700 now will purchase more of the necessaries of life than $3,500 would have done ten years ago.

Now, what is the reason assigned by the gentleman from Illinois why a salary that has been sufficient for the past ten years is not now sufficient? I think the House is entitled to know something about it.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I shall be very happy to give the gentleman the information.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

The gentleman from Georgia wants to move that the committee now rise so as to secure an extension of the time this evening.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I will yield.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I wish to ask that the committee rise so that we may have an extension of the time to complete this bill this afternoon. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CRISP having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. TOWNSHEND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. TOWNSHEND further reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the District of Columbia appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I ask unanimous consent that the order fixing the hour for adjournment at 5 o'clock be vacated for this day only.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit to the House the report of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the consular and diplomatic bill.

The first question is on agreeing to the amendments reported from the committee, unless a separate vote on some amendment be demanded.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BELMONT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. TOWNSHEND in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill H. R. 8989.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] said he would like to know some of the reasons that have actuated me in making this motion to increase the salary of this superintendent from $2,700 to $3,000 per annum. I shall be happy to give him some of those reasons.

In the first place, I contend that the superintendent of public schools in this city has not been adequately paid for the amount of learning and ability required for the discharge of the duties of an office of that kind. My second answer is that the school system of the District of Columbia has grown immeasurably during the last ten years, and during that time, too, the salaries of teachers have been increased throughout the country; and $3,000 for a position of this kind is a very moderate salary indeed.

I do not know whether the gentleman is aware of it or not, but it is the fact that more than five thousand scholars have been added to the schools here in the city of Washington within the last year and a half. The development has been wonderful. The like is not shown in any school system of any other city in the country, as I understand. If the gentleman from Alabama has watched the system he will find it is one of the most perfect and grandest school systems that can be found anywhere in the country. If I am credibly informed, this gentleman has something like thirty-five thousand scholars under his charge, and he has from four hundred and twenty to four hundred and thirty teachers immediately under his supervision. Where there is such a large interest as that it seems to me that $3,000 is a very moderate salary indeed.

The gentleman who has charge of the bill spoke about the superintendent of the colored schools receiving only $2,200. I contend, as a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, that to raise the salary of this superintendent to $3,000 will not compensate him for the discharge of his duties upon the same scale that the colored superintendent is being compensated for his duties. I say that, because he has charge of nearly three schools to one that the colored superintendent has charge of. In addition to all the white schools in the city of Washington and the District of Columbia, this superintendent has charge of all the colored schools in the District outside of the city.

If there is any class of persons in the world who ought to be properly paid for their services, they are the teachers of the young. If there is any man in the country who is doing a mighty good to the rising generation in this District, it is the gentleman who has charge of the schools, whose salary I propose to raise by this amendment. Think of it for a moment! Thirty-five thousand children daily attending in these different schools. Think of the wonderful influence a man occupying this position must have over these children.

I say this is a matter in which every one of us is interested. I have three children attending the public schools here, and I have had occasion, as every thoughtful parent has, to visit them, and I record with pleasure the fact that no better school system is to be found in America than the school system we have here to-day.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WEAVER. I assure the gentleman from Illinois that I have no doubt the superintendent is an efficient officer; but this is a bad time and the wrong time to be raising salaries. It is true it is but a mere pittance to add $300 to his salary; but his salary now is $2,700, and I call the gentleman to witness that that is really a better salary than he or any other member of Congress is drawing, taking everything into consideration, as he has no campaign expenses, lives at home, and has had for a number of years the same salary, which has now double the purchasing power that it had ten years ago. Let us relieve the tax-payer before we begin to raise salaries.

Mr. CHEADLE. I move to strike out the last word, and yield my time to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I do not agree with the gentleman from Iowa, that this superintendent is receiving a salary as great as that of a Congressman.

Mr. WEAVER. Taking everything into consideration he does.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I think not. He lives here all along, and his expenses are as great as those of a Congressman; and every one knows that it takes a Congressman's salary to support him here.

Beyond that I say his responsibilities are ten times as great as the responsibilities of a single Congressman. They can not be measured. They not only reach the present, but his influence will be felt a generation from now on those children who are attending the public schools; and this little addition I ask is but a poor pittance, and it seems to me it comes with a bad grace for any man, when we consider the character of the schools here, to raise any objection to this proposition.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman says he thinks it comes with very bad grace from any member on this floor receiving a salary of $5,000 a year to be caviling at the attempt to increase the salary of this official from $2,700 to $3,000. For myself, I represent here a part of the State of Alabama, which State has about fourteen hundred thousand inhabitants, yet neither the attorney-general, the treasurer, the auditor, the circuit judges, the chancellor, nor any executive officer of that State, nor the superintendent of education for that population of nearly a million and a half of people receives as much salary as $3,000, or as $2,700. I venture to say, also, that in the gentleman's own State of Illinois there are many officers who are much more important than this official who do not receive as much salary. I will ask the gentleman how much does the circuit judge receive in his State?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. In the city of Chicago he receives $7,000; in the country $3,500.

Mr. HERBERT. Well, sir, in half the States of this Union the circuit judges do not receive so much. In one-third of the States of this Union the governors do not receive so much salary. In one-third of the States of this Union no public officer receives as much salary as $2,700 per annum, and it seems to me, as remarked by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] who has just taken his seat, that the time has come when we ought to do something for the tax-payers instead of all the time raising the salaries of the office-holders.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois, and it was rejected—ayes 49, noes 52.

The Clerk read as follows:

For teachers: For teachers, not to exceed six hundred and ninety-three in number, including teachers of manual-training schools, to be employed at a rate of compensation not to exceed the rate provided by the present schedule of salaries, and at an average salary not to exceed $670, $464,310; and no increase in salaries paid to teachers in grades now receiving $900 or more and no increase in the number of teachers in any of such grades shall be made, and the minimum compensation shall not be less than at the rate of $300 per annum, and the names of and actual compensation paid to each teacher under this provision shall be reported to Congress at its next session by the commissioners: Provided, That in assigning salaries to teachers no discrimination shall be made between male and female teachers employed in the same grade of school or performing a like class of duties.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Page 17, line 9, after the word "more," insert "except in cases of promotion to fill vacancies occurring before or after the passage of this act, and except in salaries to principals of normal schools."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the police court: For one judge, $3,000; one clerk, $2,000; one deputy clerk, $1,000; two bailiffs, at $3 per day each; one messenger, $900; one doorkeeper, $540; contingent expenses, including compensation of a justice of the peace acting as judge of the police court during the absence of said judge, not exceeding $300; books, stationery, fuel, ice, gas, witness-fees, and other necessary items, $2,500; for judicial expenses, $2,500; in all, $14,318.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend on page 25, line 6, by inserting after the word "dollars" the words "United States marshal's office, $1,400;" and by striking out in line 12 the words "fourteen thousand three" and inserting "fifteen thousand seven."

The amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the relief of the poor, $15,000.

For the support and maintenance of the Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum, $15,000.

For the Women's Christian Association, $3,000.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend on page 30, line 3, by striking out "three" and inserting "four;" so as to make the appropriation for the Women's Christian Association $4,000.

I understand, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment will only make the appropriation what it has been in previous years, $4,000. The committee have reduced it from four thousand to three thousand, and my amendment would simply restore it to the former sum. I think if the committee were familiar with all the facts they would not have proposed the reduction, and upon that point I beg leave to say that I think that perhaps the ladies in charge of the institution did not give the committee as full information in regard to their work as they ought to have done.

The association own the building. It has been furnished by the Government heretofore, and it is in a condition to accommodate a larger number than the association will be able to feed with this appropriation of $3,000. I am told that they accommodate there a class of indigent, infirm, and disabled women that can not be received at other institutions in the city except for limited periods. The ladies who have charge of this institution are undoubtedly spending their time and effort as a matter of pure charity, as a labor of love, without remuneration or reward; and they claim that the reduction of this appropriation from $4,000 to $3,000 will very seriously embarrass them, that in fact it must limit the number of women that they will be able to feed, while they say at the same time that the number of applicants now is greater than it was when the appropriation was $4,000. I have been hoping that the committee would accept this amendment and restore the appropriation to what it was before. I will say to the committee that I am not personally very familiar with this work, but my attention was called to it at a time when the ladies in charge of it were unable to obtain an audience before the committee.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. This bill is the most liberal one in favor of charities and institutions of that kind that has ever passed this House, so far as I know. In several cases it increases the appropriations of last year for institutions of this sort, and new ones are added to the list. It is true that this institution has been cut down from $4,000 to $3,000 in the present bill.

The principal reason that influenced the committee in that action was the fact that last year, as shown by the report of the commissioners, this institution received by the appropriation from the Government $4,000, and from other sources $3,978.62, making a total of $7,978.62, while the total expenses of the institution for the last fiscal year was $5,980.80, leaving a balance on hand on June 30, 1887, of $1,997.82. I do not claim that that is on hand now, but it was on hand at the end of the last fiscal year, and the amount spent by the institution last year was less than $6,000. Now, we appropriate $3,000 in this bill, and if that is doubled by outside contributions it will make the $6,000, and we see no reason why the amount in the bill should be increased.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. It is true that last year, and I think for some years back, $4,000 was the amount appropriated for the Women's Christian Association. When we were making up this bill in the subcommittee the managers of this institution did not appear before us, and inasmuch as no estimates were sent to us in regard to charities, we were somewhat in the dark. Information came to us from other quarters that the Women's Christian Association were not doing all that they should do under their articles of incorporation, and the further information came to us that no one could get in there unless indorsed by some of the churches. We felt that if this charity was sustained by the General Government no church should have exclusive control as to those who should enter it, and we thought—to use a homely phrase—that we would wake them up a little by cutting them down a thousand dollars until we could find out about the matter. We did find out—at least I did; for the ladies in charge of this work came up here in a body and I was just fool enough to state frankly what had operated upon my mind, whereupon I got a flood of light upon the subject which I had not bargained for [laughter], and became thoroughly satisfied that we had done gross injustice to the ladies and the institution.

They denied in toto that there was any such limitation as we had heard, and maintained that the charity which Christ advocated is recognized in this institution, no matter from what source the needy ones may come. I advised them to see my worthy colleague on the subcommittee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CLEMENTS], and they made every effort to do so, but were unable to see him at that time. I do not know whether they have yet seen him or not.

For my part, I will now cheerfully add my vote in favor of this amendment. I believe we wronged this institution in cutting the appropriation down $1,000 below what has heretofore been given. But if the facts were as we had been informed I should be in favor of cutting down even a little further, because if we are to pay out the money of the Government for charity I want the charity to include every deserving applicant contemplated by the object of the institution appropriated for. The officers of this institution assure us that they are acting in conformity with this rule. Therefore I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to, there being—ayes 36, noes 17.

The Clerk read as follows:

For interest on water-stock bonds, $26,250.
For sinking fund on water-stock bonds, $18,360.

Mr. CLEMENTS. By instruction of the committee, I move to strike out the paragraphs just read and insert in lieu thereof—

For interest and sinking fund on water-stock bonds, $44,610.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Treasurer of the United States is hereby directed and authorized to apply such portion as may be deemed expedient of any surplus which may remain at the close of the fiscal year 1888, and of each fiscal year thereafter, of the general revenues of the District of Columbia in excess of one-half of those appropriations payable equally out of the revenues of the District and the United States, to the payment of the balance yet remaining unpaid of the debt of the District of Columbia created by the act approved July 15, 1882, entitled, "An act to increase the water supply of the city of Washington, and for other purposes." Provided, That the amount of said surplus shall first be reported to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and the Treasurer of the United States by the First Comptroller of the Treasury when called upon to do so.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, the section just read is admitted to be subject to a point of order, and for the purpose of presenting some questions in connection with it I desire to interpose a formal objection. Perhaps the committee has been wise in putting this section in the bill and asking us to pass it by unanimous consent; but surely it is not wise to pass so important a provision without any explanation whatever. I will state very briefly why I make this formal objection, which perhaps I shall not insist upon.

Every one who has been in Washington for the last few years knows how rapidly the city has been growing, both in population and in the assessed value of its property. I have lived for thirty years in a city of which the same remark is true; and I know how hard it is for a legislative body, either a city council or a Congress, to appreciate the rapidity with which the needs of a growing city increase. It seems that there is here a surplus revenue, due to the rapid growth of the city and the rapid rise in the assessed valuation of property. This surplus, as appears by a statement near the bottom of page 2 of the report accompanying this bill, is already about $400,000. The committees say that, owing to this increase of surplus revenue, some disposition must be made of it; and on this point they submit three questions for the House to answer. If I had not interposed this formal objection, the effect would have been that, passing this bill in the manner in which we usually pass it, paying very little attention to its provisions, leaving them almost always to the hands of the committee, a permanant provision of law would have been adopted which might, perhaps, embarrass the growth of the city. I do not say positively it would do so; for I do not profess intimate knowledge of the affairs of the District. But on page 3 of the report, in view of the surplus revenue which is accruing, the committee state, if I may use the phrase, three alternatives, one of which must be adopted: First, that the tax-payers ought to pay something more than the 50 per cent. proportion of the expenses of the District; second, that the excess of revenue should be applied to the extinguishment of the funded debt; or, third, that the surplus should be applied to the liquidation of the debt owing to the General Government by the District for the increase of the water supply.

Now, every one must see that there is a fourth alternative, so to speak, Congress might appropriate more money. If the city is growing very rapidly and its demands are correspondingly increasing, if it needs to have more money appropriated for it, then Congress must appropriate more, or else the tax-payers must pay more than the 50 per cent. proportion. That is the question we start with. The committee say that "this bill is believed to be amply liberal in its provisions, and sufficient in the aggregate for a wise and provident administration of the government of the District." I observe that they say also, in the first part of the report, that the estimates upon which this bill was framed aggregated $4,998,755, which is a great deal more than is appropriated in this bill.

Now, I would like to ask the committee whether the tax-payers of the District, either directly or indirectly, have been consulted as to whether they would not rather pay something more of the 50 per cent. of the expenses of the District in order that the streets may be more rapidly improved? Every one knows that we, sitting here in this Chamber, can not appreciate the growth of this city.

Mr. RANDALL took the floor and yielded his time to Mr. ADAMS.

Mr. ADAMS. I think the impression is prevalent that street improvements do not go on here as fast as they ought to; and every one who has given a moment's reflection to the matter must become convinced of the fact that, growing as rapidly as this city does, if more money were expended, and expended in the right way, the actual value of the assessable property would be vastly increased, and the appropriations which are taken from the Treasury of the United States might be largely diminished, and after a few years in all probability be altogether suspended. As the assessable value of the property of the city increases and as the city grows more money will necessarily be derived from taxation, and I ask if it is not good policy instead of hampering this growth to do what may be done in a proper way to advance it?

Have these matters, I ask, been considered by the committee? Are not the tax-payers of the District willing on their part to increase their proportion of appropriations over and above the 50 per cent. now paid rather than not have these street improvements go on? For my part, I, as a Congressman, would be glad to appropriate more money to match the additional money which would come in in the shape of revenue by the growth of the city and the enhancement of its values; and on the ground, as I stated a few moments ago, that as these values increase and additional money flows into the treasury of the District from its available sources of revenue, that we may be enabled after awhile to stop the expenditure of money from the public Treasury. That I would be willing to do as a Congressman. Now, suppose I was a tax-payer here and the owner of real estate, which I am not, I would rather pay more than the 50 per cent. than see the city outgrowing the appropriations made from year to year.

As I said, I live in a city where we have suffered for years because people have not been able to appreciate the growth of the city and to make the expenditures on such a scale as to conform to that growth and aid it.

I have spoken on this subject, Mr. Chairman, professing no familiarity whatever with the question, but upon the ground that the committee, in my judgment, ought to give us a little light upon it, and particularly as to whether the District would not prefer to increase its percentage, fixed by the act of 1863, to a larger amount than that specified, so that these improvements could be carried on more expeditiously.

I would rather have that done, if I was a tax-payer here, than to have the growth of the city crippled and hampered by inadequate appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Illinois should remember that the Government of the United States is largely in advance on this subject already by the appropriation of money for the extension of the water-works, and it is hardly possible to devise a better mode of returning that money to the United States than in the manner here spoken of. We should fall into the same difficulty exactly if we were enforced to be extravagant here and hoped to realize increased revenue by the collection of taxes.

I can not imagine a better way than that which we have devised here of getting this money into the Treasury of the United States from the District than to appropriate that surplus in excess of the requirements of the District. By so doing we return to the United States that which it has so liberally and largely advanced in this connection; and it will relieve not only the tax-payers but the Government itself from paying this amount.

Mr. ADAMS. I will admit all of that. That is an economic way of disposing of the matter unquestionably, and is a very satisfactory way, unless, of course, a more economical plan can be devised. The question is, what is the difference between the $4,998,000 the estimate calls for and the amount you actually do appropriate?

Mr. RANDALL. This bill is not only liberal but generous towards the District. The Government of the United States agreed by law to pay 50 per cent. of these expenses on a false basis, which includes not only the public buildings but the streets and reservations of the city.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. RANDALL. I have not entirely concluded, but will listen to any suggestion the gentleman desires to make with pleasure.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I was going to say that I hoped the gentleman from Illinois would not insist upon the objection he has made, in order that we might be allowed to finish the bill this evening. If he will notice the language of this section 3, it only provides that the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to apply such portion as he may deem expedient of this surplus fund. It does not obligate him to dispose of the whole of it in that manner. Now, of course there will be no surplus if Congress appropriates this sum. It depends upon the appropriations made as to whether there is anything to apply. If this bill passes we have about $483,000 of surplus.

The gentleman from Illinois says there was an estimate made for a much larger sum than that recommended.

Mr. ADAMS. Yes; four millions nine hundred thousand.

Mr. CLEMENTS. That is true; but I will state to the gentleman that to have complied with those estimates would have required new law all along the line, or a waiving of the rule against a change of the law. That would apply to the increase of the police force, to the superintendent of public schools, to the superintendent of police. All along it would have required a change of law, which we are not authorized to make, to comply with the estimates to which the gentleman alludes.

Now, this bill recommends $107,000 more for streets than was appropriated last year. Still this surplus is left over and above all; and next year there will be a reassessment, which occurs every three years, and experience of the past shows that the assessed value of the property has increased always under those valuations. This surplus will be greatly increased hereafter; and we will not only have to dispose of what is now on hand, but provide in all probability for disposing of further accumulations.

As regards the liberality with which the District has been treated, it must be remembered that not only does Congress make appropriations for streets, but it makes appropriations for other public purposes. The Freedman's Hospital and others are provided for in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. RANDALL. And that comes wholly out of the United States Treasury.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Yes; no part of that comes from the District. Then the public parks, etc., are provided for from the United States Treasury.

Mr. SPINOLA. Will the gentleman be kind enough to state the rate of taxation in the District of Columbia?

Mr. CLEMENTS. The rate is $1.50 per hundred dollars in the city and $1 outside of the city.

Mr. SPINOLA. One-half of which is paid by the property and the other by the Government?

Mr. CLEMENTS. That is what is paid by the property, and then we appropriate for the purpose of the District, the United States Treasury paying one-half the appropriation.

Mr. RANDALL. For every dollar the rate-payers give the Government gives another.

Mr. SPINOLA. It is the cheapest governed city that I know of.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Allow me to state one other fact. It must be remembered that this District and the Government of the United States together are now paying interest on the bonded debt of $20,000,000, nearly all of which was incurred in the cutting down, grading, and improving of the streets.

Now we have advanced the whole expense of the new improvement for bringing water into the city. That has been advanced by the Federal Government; and we simply provide that any surplus for which Congress does not appropriate an equal amount shall go to that purpose instead of remaining idle in the Treasury.

Mr. ADAMS. That is all right of itself, provided it does not take the place of another change which the people of the District might prefer, by which the citizens should pay not merely one-half, but, say, two-thirds of the expenses of the District. If I were a tax-payer I would rather have it that way, and have the whole applied to the improvements that are needed, instead of having an accumulating surplus.

Mr. McCOMAS. If the gentleman were a tax-payer he would find the great majority of the citizens did not want to pay more than half the expenses.

As regards the objection of the gentleman from Illinois I think two statements will remove his difficulty. This is not a removal of any limitation on the appropriation. I think we have been fairly liberal toward the citizens of the District in the bill before the committee. It is $111,000 in excess of the act for the current year.

Mr. RANDALL. Two hundred and twenty-two thousand dollars.

Mr. McCOMAS. The net amount is what I have stated. It is $152,000 less a decrease of $41,000, which makes a sum of $111,000.

There was a surplus in the Treasury in the year 1885 to the credit of the District of $30,380. In 1886 the surplus was $184,000; and in 1887 the surplus was $294,000. For the current year it will exceed $300,000. The total, therefore, at the end of last year, after deducting certain charges, was $381,000 of surplus. At the end of next year it will be nearly three-quarters of a million, if no unforeseen expenditure occurs. If the Senate should conclude to give all or near all the estimates of expenditure in this bill, there would still be a surplus to be appropriated out of District funds; and where could it be better appropriated than to the payment for the water-works now being executed at a cost of several million dollars, and for which the District has had an appropriation made in the deficiency appropriation bill, so that the current revenue may be applied to the current expenditure of this year?

The objection my friend from Illinois foresees as to the policy of this District if there should be a large and rapidly accumulating surplus does not arise on this bill. The committee guard against it by making this provision as to the surplus on hand until further arrangements can be made.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will take the floor and will yield the gentleman my time if in the first place he will answer me a question. If in any locality in or about this city it is absolutely necessary that streets should be opened and improved, should that work be left undone if there be money in the Treasury to do it? Should it not be appropriated wherever it is necessary to have immediate improvements?

My friend is aware there are localities where men have been waiting for years to build, men who have been paying taxes for forty years, and yet have not a road by which they can get to their property; the commissioners being willing to do it for them and asking for the necessary appropriations. My own impression is that an appropriation to enable them to make those improvements should be made. I agree there has been no bill ever presented to this House which has been prepared with more scrupulous care. I have no doubt the commissioners are willing to meet the wants of the public and to do it economically. And I feel some arrangement should be made by which men who have property they want to get to might secure the opening of the street.

Mr. McCOMAS. In answer to the question of my colleague on the committee, I will say the present bill has an increase to the extent of $108,000 for the improvement of the streets over the appropriation for the current year.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I am aware of that.

Mr. McCOMAS. There is also a largely increased amount of appropriation for current repairs. The provision of this bill does not prevent my colleague or anybody from putting on the appropriation bill the expenditure of every dollar of this surplus. It only provides that when Congress shall not appropriate, the appropriation shall not lie idle, but shall be applied toward paying the water bond debt.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understand that; but where the necessity for improving streets is urgent a larger appropriation might properly be made, and the commissioners of the District have pointed out localities where improvements might be made. My friend knows we have visited localities of this city where in winter the mud was so deep that coal and other necessaries could not be delivered to the families, and almost within the shadow of this Capitol. I suggest, therefore, to my friend from Illinois that the surplus is needed to make improvements in various localities.

Mr. McCOMAS. There can not properly be a surplus while the District has twenty millions of debt.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, is there any proposition pending on which we can vote? Let us dispose of this matter by a vote.

Mr. ADAMS. It is not a proposition on which the committee has to vote. I simply urged an objection which I now withdraw.

Mr. McCOMAS. I desire to have a correction made on line 23, by striking out the period after "same," in the last line of that page, and inserting a semicolon.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection, that correction will be made.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CRISP having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. TOWNSHEND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8989), had directed him to report back the same with sundry amendments.

The amendments were agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLEMENTS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to introduce the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and to put it upon its passage. It is simply a resolution providing for the consideration of business from certain committees, without interfering materially with the regular course of the proceedings of the House.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the House will on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Saturday, and Monday, May 22, 23, 24, 26, and 28, take a recess at 5 o'clock p. m. until 8 o'clock p. m., and that the evening sessions shall be devoted exclusively to bills and measures reported by the following committees, in the order to be designated by such committees, namely:

Tuesday evening, to bills and measures reported from the Committee on Commerce;

Wednesday evening, to bills and measures reported from the Committee on Pacific Railroads;

Thursday evening, to bills and measures reported from the Committee on Territories;

Saturday evening, to bills reported from the Committee on the Public Lands; and

Monday evening, to bills and measures reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. And that if, at the adjournment of the House on either of the evenings indicated any bill called up and partially considered should remain undisposed of, such bill shall be considered in the House on the succeeding legislative day, immediately after the reading of the Journal, and, after one hour's debate thereon (except on Thursday, when three hours' debate shall be allowed), to be equally divided between those in favor of and those opposed to the bill, the House shall proceed to vote upon all pending amendments and on the final passage of the bill without any intervening motion or business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. HERBERT. Is this a report from the Committee on Rules?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. It is not, but I do not think they will object to it.

Mr. MACDONALD. This is too important a matter to be passed upon now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Then let it be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MACDONALD. I think it should be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WEAVER. It is understood by the House generally that the Committee on Rules are unanimous in approving it.

Mr. MACDONALD. I don't care about that. I want to have it acted upon by the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Minnesota object to the introduction of the resolution for reference to the committee?

Mr. MACDONALD. No, sir.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BURROWS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Before putting the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] the Chair will lay before the House a report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 4908) for the relief of A. Gates Lee, surviving partner of A. G. and B. P. Lee;

A bill (H. R. 2068) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay certain citizens of Chicago, employés of the custom-house, for extra time services;

A bill (H. R. 8006) to amend section 5388 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to timber depredations;

A bill (H. R. 5683) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to complete a contract for the sale of certain real estate to Job Barnard;

A bill (H. R. 639) to authorize Commander John W. Philip, United States Navy, to accept a silver pitcher from the Government of the United States of Colombia;

SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 22, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. HOAR. The Journal as read by the Secretary states that a resolution which I offered yesterday was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The resolution was adopted. It was a resolution instructing the Committee on Military Affairs to consider a certain subject, and it was adopted. I move to amend the Journal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal entry will be read. However, before the Journal entry is read by the Secretary, the Chair would call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to his own statement on page 4684 of the RECORD, the first paragraph of which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK read as follows:

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was read:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to consider and report whether some amendment to the laws ought not to be made prohibiting the enlistment in the Army of the United States in time of peace of men with wives or families dependent on them for support without notice to or consent of their wives."

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to observe, in sending the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs—

Mr. HOAR. I observed that, but I did not intend by that phrase to imply that the resolution was to be referred to the committee to be considered, but I intended that it should be acted upon. As an easier way to get out of it, I will ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs be reconsidered, and that the resolution be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the vote of the Senate referring the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs will be reconsidered, and the resolution will be agreed to. It is so ordered, if there be no objection.

If there be no motion to amend or correct the Journal, it will stand approved as read.

L. J. WORDEN—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 1054, entitled "An act for the relief of L. J. Worden."

This bill directs the Postmaster-General to allow to L. J. Worden, recently the postmaster at Lawrence, Kans., the sum of $625, paid out by him as such postmaster for clerk-hire during the period from July 1, 1882, to June 30, 1883.

The allowances to these officers for clerk-hire and other like expenses are fixed in each case by the Post-Office Department, and are paid out of an appropriation made in gross to cover them all. The excess of receipts for box-rents and commissions, over and above the salary of the postmaster, is adopted by law as the maximum amount of such allowances in each case; and within that limit the amount appropriated is apportioned by the Post-Office Department to the different offices according to their needs.

The allowances to the Lawrence post-office for the year ending June 30, 1883, were $3,100. This was fully its proportion of the appropriation made by Congress for that year, and as much as was in most cases given to other offices of the same grade. In September, 1882, during the first quarter of the year in question, the postmaster made application for an increase of his allowances, which was declined; and a similar application in December of the same year was also declined. The reason given for non-compliance with this request in both cases was a lack of funds. It is the rule to make only such allowances in any year as can be paid from the appropriation made for that period.

No further application for increase of allowances was made by Mr. Worden until March, 1884, when the same was increased $500 for the year, to date from the 1st day of January preceding.

It was found at that time, after a full and fair investigation by the Department, which had in hand abundant funds for an increase of these allowances, that notwithstanding the increase of business at this post-office, $500 added to the allowances for the year from July 1, 1882, to June 30, 1883, was sufficient. And yet more than twice that sum is added by the bill under consideration to the allowances for the year last named.

Forty-four postmasters have submitted vouchers, amounting to nearly $9,000, for clerk-hire during that year, in excess of allowances; but they were all rejected, and I understand have not been insisted upon.

I assume that the Post-Office Department in 1884 dealt justly and fairly by the postmaster at Lawrence, and upon this theory, if he should be reimbursed any expenditure for a previous year, the demand he now makes is excessive.

But the cases should be exceedingly rare in which postmasters are awarded any more than the allowances made by the Department officers. They have the very best means of ascertaining the amount necessary to meet the demands of the service in any particular case; and it certainly may be assumed that they desire to properly accommodate the public in the matter of postal facilities. When the appropriation is sufficient, the decision of the Department should be final; and when the money in hand does not admit of adequate allowances, postmasters should only be reimbursed money voluntarily expended by them when recommended by the Postmaster-General.

Any other course leads to the expenditure of money by postmasters for work which they should do themselves, and to the employment of clerks which are unnecessary. The least encouragement that they may be repaid such expenditure by a special appropriation would dangerously tend to the substitution of their judgment for that of the Department, and to the relaxation of wholesome discipline.

I think when the application of Mr. Worden for an increase in his allowances was twice declined for any cause during the year covering his present demand, that if he made personal expenditures for clerk-hire, and especially if he did so without the encouragement of the Department, they were made at his own risk. It appears, too, that the amount of his claim is larger than can be justified in any event.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 18, 1888.

The time allowed the Executive by the Constitution for the examination of bills presented to him by Congress for his action expired in the case of the bill herewith returned on Saturday, May 19. The Senate adjourned or took a recess on Thursday afternoon, May 17, until to-day (the 21st of May).

On the day of said recess or adjournment the above message, disapproving said bill and accompanying its return to the Senate, where it originated, was drawn, and on May 18 was engrossed and signed. On Saturday, the 19th of May, the Senate not being in session, the message and the bill were tendered to the Secretary of the Senate, who declined to receive them, and thereupon they were on the same day tendered to the President of the Senate, who also declined to receive the same, both of these officials claiming that the return of said bill and the delivery of said message could only properly be made to the Senate when in actual session.

They are therefore transmitted as soon as the Senate reconvenes after its recess, with this explanation.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

Mr. HOAR. The communication of the President of the United States, which has just been read, raises a very important constitutional question, far beyond anything involved in the merits of the bill itself. I think it proper that the Senate should give its careful consideration to the matter, and I move that the message be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the bill and the accompanying message be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

LIZZIE WRIGHT OWEN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 42) granting a pension to Lizzie Wright Owen; which were in line 3, after the name "Owen," to strike out "only surviving daughter of George Wright, late a brigadier-general of United States Volunteers," and insert "widow of —— Owen, late an officer of the Army of the United States;" and in line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty" and insert "eighteen;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lizzie Wright Owen, widow of —— Owen, late an officer of the Army of the United States, and pay her a pension at the rate of $18 per month.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask that the amendment as to the rate be disagreed to, and that a committee of conference be appointed thereon. I did not understand the other matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate disagree to the amendments made by the House of Representatives, and ask for a conference on the bill and amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. BLAIR, Mr. DOLPH, and Mr. FAULKNER were appointed.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5445) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, and asking for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. ALLISON, Mr. DAWES, and Mr. GORMAN were appointed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DOLPH presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Portland, Oregon, praying that a large appropriation be made for the support of the revenue marine; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TELLER. I present a petition of citizens of Montana Territory, praying for legislation to preserve to citizens of the United States mineral lands along the Northern Pacific Railway, and to prevent the Northern Pacific Railway Company from acquiring lands to which it is not entitled by its grant.

I desire to say that it seems to me it is impossible that there should be any legislation needed or required on this subject. It is entirely within the province of the Department charged with the execution of the law under this grant to protect the people in all the rights that they have.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MINNIE A. BAILEY.

Mr. PLATT. On the 24th of April, when I was not in the Senate, the Committee on Pensions reported adversely upon the bill (S. 2344) granting a pension to Minnie A. Bailey. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill (S. 2344) granting a pension to Minnie A. The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPOONER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2901) granting to the Milwaukee, Lake Shore and Western Railway Company the right of way through the Lac de Flambeau Indian reservation, in the State of Wisconsin.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

And the consent of the Indians on said reservation thereto shall have been first obtained in a manner satisfactory to the President of the United States.

Mr. DAWES. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "thereto," after "reservation," in line 15.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. After the word "reservation," in line 15, I move to insert "as to the amount of said compensation."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was to add to section 2 the following proviso:

Provided, That said railroad shall be located, constructed, and operated with due regard to the rights of the Indians and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 3, before the word "years," to strike out "five" and insert "three;" so as to make the section read:

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. In section 2, at the end of line 16, after the amendment already agreed to, I move to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That if said Indians shall refuse to accept a sum which, in the judgment of the President, is a just compensation for said right of way, the said compensation shall then be ascertained in such manner as the President shall direct, having due regard to the rights of the Indians, in which event the said company shall have the right to take and occupy said right of way by paying the compensation so ascertained in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior shall direct.

The amendment was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BAR HARBOR, ME.

Mr. FARWELL. I move to take up Senate bill 2615, Order of Business 938.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator yield to me for the passage of a bill that will take no time?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I appeal to the Senator to yield to me for the passage of a bill which has been a good deal delayed and is a local matter.

Mr. FARWELL. This is the Baltimore and Potomac bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois is entitled to the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. FARWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. I move to take up for passage Order of Business 1273, being House bill 4467.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4467) for the erection of a public building at Bar Harbor, in Maine.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REVOLUTIONARY BATTLE-FIELD OF BENNINGTON.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1304, Senate bill 2920, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. FARWELL. How much time will it take?

Mr. EDMUNDS. About a minute and a half.

Mr. FARWELL. I yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2920) relative to the Revolutionary battle-field of Bennington. It provides for the payment to the governor of the State of Vermont of $22,000, to be by him transferred to the Bennington Battle Monument Association, to be expended by them in the erection of a suitable iron stairway, for the removal of buildings, and grading and improving the grounds surrounding the monument erected to commemorate the Revolutionary battle of Bennington.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE AT NEBRASKA CITY.

Mr. FARWELL. I now move to take up Order of Business 938, being the bill (S. 2615) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to acquire and use real estate for railway purposes in the District of Columbia.

Mr. PADDOCK. I appeal to the Senator from Illinois. I wish to call up a bridge bill.

Mr. FARWELL. If it will not take longer than two minutes, I will yield.

Mr. PADDOCK. It will not, I think.

Mr. FARWELL. I yield.

Mr. PADDOCK. It is Order of Business 1369, Senate bill 2674. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. 2674) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Nebraska City, Nebr., and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has not yet come in from the Printer.

Mr. PADDOCK. I have it here. I send it to the desk.

The bill was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When this bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce it was with amendments which have not been incorporated in the bill which has just been read, the bill with the amendments not having been received from the Printer.

Mr. PADDOCK. I inquire of the Senator who reported the bill if there are amendments to the bill?

Mr. VEST. The bill was reported with amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They do not appear in the printed copy that has just been read.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course I know nothing about the bill after I reported it. That is a clerical matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the paper which has been read is not the true present file of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was stated when the bill was called up for consideration that the printed bill with the amendments of the committee had not yet come in. The original bill has been read.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the bill be postponed.

Mr. PADDOCK. I will simply suggest that the bill be laid aside until the printed copy comes in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

BALTIMORE AND POTOMAC RAILROAD.

Mr. FARWELL. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2615) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to acquire and use real estate for railway purposes in the District of Columbia.

Mr. VEST. Unless I am very greatly at fault in my memory, my impression is that that bill by a general understanding was to go over until to-day a week. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], whom I see in his seat now, made that request of the Senate, and I understood it to be agreed to. The Senator from Vermont is in no condition physically to discuss the bill to-day, and I suppose he is under the same impression that I am. I hope its consideration will not be pressed under the circumstances.

Mr. CAMERON. The following proceeding took place on the 11th of May:

Mr. FARWELL. I desire to call up for consideration at this time Order of Business 938, being the bill (S. 2615) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to acquire and use real estate for railway purposes in the District of Columbia.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] asked me to state that he received this morning a telegram from Senator MORRILL, of Vermont, asking him to see the Senator and request him to postpone calling up this bill until next week, when he will be here. He wants to be present when it is considered. That was stated to me this morning by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. FARWELL. I do not feel like yielding at this time. This bill has been on the Calendar for six weeks, and the feature which the Senator from Vermont objects to is the bridge across Sixth street. This bill does not disturb anything north of Maryland avenue.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The merits of the bill are not subject to discussion while a motion to take up is under consideration.

Mr. FARWELL. I do not feel like yielding to the request. I insist on my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think the Senator from Illinois could have heard the request made by the Senator from West Virginia. The Senator from Vermont is absent from the city and is ill. He asks to have the bill postponed until next week, when he will be here.

That is, this week—

Mr. FARWELL. Very well; if that is the desire I will defer calling up the bill until Monday.

That "Monday" was yesterday. There was no understanding whatever that this should be put off until next Tuesday.

Mr. MORRILL. This matter was under consideration a week ago to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is compelled to state that, under the rules, before 2 o'clock a motion to proceed to the consideration of any bill on the Calendar must be decided without debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague have leave to make a statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do not understand the Chair. If there is anything that involves the Baltimore and Potomac line, I may have an objection to offer. I could not hear anything because there was talk behind me here. I have no objection to any Senator making a statement, but I do want to know what motion is to be put.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Virginia that the question is upon the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] to proceed to the consideration of the bill. The Chair holds that it must be decided without debate, except by unanimous consent, which has been given to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to proceed.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, a week ago yesterday I was present when the Senator from Illinois called this bill up again, and it will be seen from my statement that I expected it to be postponed to a week from to-day. I said in reply to a question of the Senator from Illinois:

I hope the Senator from Illinois will not insist on that motion. This is a minor question as compared with the one presented by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER], and just made a special order for a week from Tuesday next.

Then at the close of what I said I remarked:

I do not feel well enough to do it to-day, but I hope to be prepared to do it a week from Tuesday, or I will make no further opposition.

This was considered, and the motion to take up the bill was finally withdrawn by the Senator from Illinois without making any objection to my proposition. Now, it does seem to me that a decision of this kind so arrived at has never been changed by the Senate. It was the clear understanding, I think, on the part of the Senate, all except perhaps the Senator from Illinois, that it was to go over until a week from the following Tuesday. Now, Mr. President, I have taken some pains to prepare some facts on this question. I do not often intrude myself unless I think I have some contribution to make to the subject; and in relation to this matter I have accumulated a great many facts that I think it is important for the Senate to know, and if this question is postponed it will not prevent the Senator from Illinois from having his bill considered, as it is embodied in a substitute proposed for the bill reported from the committee.

If the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company can get an opportunity to go into any square where it chooses, or any street it pleases, we may bid farewell to any further legislation so far as any relief is concerned from the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad. It is all the legislation we are likely to have.

I hope that the clear understanding as presented by the RECORD of the 15th instant will not be violated by taking up this subject this morning when I have no documents here prepared to exhibit to the Senate to show my side of the question.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Virginia proceeding? The Chair hears none.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I only desire to state that I should like to have the consideration of this subject postponed until some time next week. I have a constituent interest to represent in this matter, and I have also some interest to represent throughout the entire South.

Mr. FARWELL. I think the Senator from Virginia mistakes the character of the bill now called up.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. No, sir; I am for your bill. My friend from Vermont wants to offer an amendment, and I am afraid of that amendment. I think the subject had better go over until next week. The opposition to your bill will agree to its going over.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the consent of the Senate ["Go on!"] to authorize me at least to appeal to the Senator from Illinois, and I do so from the standpoint of a member of the committee in the main in sympathy with his views and his policy on this question? If the bill reported by the Senator from West Virginia shall be first acted upon, and if the policy provided by that bill shall be agreed to by the Senate, then the passage of the bill of the Senator from Illinois follows as a necessary incident, as it seems to me, and he will have no trouble in passing the bill. But to press it now involves not only the question provided for in his bill, but necessarily and incidentally all the questions provided for in the other bill when the other will not be considered for a week from this time.

But wholly independent of these considerations, in the face of the appeal of the Senator from Vermont, I am sure I would not insist upon the consideration of any bill when any Senator would make such a statement as has been made by the Senator from Vermont. It is due to that Senator that he have the time and opportunity to reflect the views that he wishes to reflect, and to give the Senate the information that he proposes to give in respect to the questions involved both in his bill and in the bill reported by the Senator from West Virginia. I therefore appeal to the Senator from Illinois to withdraw his motion and let his bill remain on the Calendar until a week from to-day.

Mr. FARWELL. Mr. President, I ask consent to make a statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Senator from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. FARWELL. This bill was reported on the 6th of April. I have been endeavoring to get it before the Senate at various periods from that day to this.

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company have had a bill prepared to enable them to come into the city and have their station opposite the Baltimore and Potomac station. That bill the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] has had made a special order for next Tuesday. The bill of the Senator from Vermont involves exactly what is provided for in that bill with the addition of removing the Baltimore and Potomac station something over half a mile farther south. That is a question which, as I understand, will be discussed by those Senators.

The little bill which I have had the honor of asking for the consideration of on different occasions provides for no such question. I will state again that it only provides that the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company may obtain lands south of the present tracks, south or Virginia and Maryland avenues, so as to enable them to take the tracks off the streets and enable them to get to a block of land near the Long Bridge on this side of the river. The question of bringing in the Baltimore and Ohio and the question of removing the Baltimore and Potomac station to another point are not involved in this bill.

This is simply a question of permitting the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to acquire ground to extend their tracks to a square near the Long Bridge. I do not think I have been unaffable, so to speak, in this matter at all. I do not think there has been any understanding which I have violated. The question in this bill has been well known. Every railroad that has been built into a city has had strips of land for its business and has had permission to purchase more; that is all the bill provides for. I ask that it be considered.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, is debate in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent only. Is there objection to the Senator from Connecticut proceeding? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am a little surprised by the remarks of the Senator from Illinois. It is true that the pending bill refers only to taking possession of certain lots of land and squares below the present station; but if I am correctly informed by a petition presented in behalf of the Citizens' Representative Committee of One Hundred, of Washington, it does not designate in advance what lands or streets are to be acquired, and it is without limit of time when such railroad company may exercise the rights accorded by the bill. But I was not born yesterday, and I think most of the Senators are older than that. It is perfectly apparent, from the remarks made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], and from the remarks interjected by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON], that it is all part of one question. Nobody supposes, if the Baltimore and Potomac Company are at liberty to go and take possession by condemnation of unlimited quantities of land just below for the establishment of permanent buildings, it will be worth while then to discuss the great question as to whether the Baltimore and Potomac Company shall ever remain a tenant without the payment of a cent of this magnificent Mall. If this bill be passed, then there is no use of resisting the Baltimore and Ohio bill. If the Baltimore and Ohio bill is passed there is no use in resisting this. This will settle that question, and that Baltimore and Ohio bill will settle this, that the two great railroads are to have their two great stations and sidetracks and shops, for aught I know, without limit, covering that magnificent piece of public ground. It is all one question.

Why not make it on next Tuesday all one discussion? I beg the Senator from Illinois not to attempt to push through this little bit of a bill to fortify the Baltimore and Potomac in the present possession of the Mall by itself.

Mr. FARWELL. I do not think it does. I wish to say right here, in answer to the Senator from Connecticut, who says that the Baltimore and Potomac has paid nothing, that it pays $7,500 a year for the ground taken; and in taxes last year in all $16,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. I was not aware of the rent. I am glad to be corrected.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield? The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. FARWELL. I yield.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not ask the Senator to yield; I ask unanimous consent to proceed. With some amendments, I am in favor of the bill to which the Senator from Illinois refers, but I am utterly opposed to its present consideration, and that without any regard to its merits or to its effect, if it should be enacted, upon the other propositions to which the Senator from Connecticut has alluded.

A week ago yesterday the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], standing here in his place, stated that he desired to be heard against this bill, that he could not be ready to debate it until a week from to-day, and that if he were not ready at that time he should forbear further opposition to the bill. I know that he understood, and I am free to say that I understood it as he did, that by general consent under the circumstances the consideration of this bill was to be postponed until next Tuesday.

If that be a misunderstanding on the part of the Senator from Vermont, which I think it is not, I hope the day has not come and will not soon come when this Senate, distinguished for courtesy among its members, will force upon consideration a bill where a Senator opposed to it, acting in perfect good faith, is able to say he has been misled or was misunderstood as to the day on which it was to be considered and is not now prepared to debate it.

There is no tremendous haste about this matter. This Congress is not to end in a week, and I fancy the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company can transact without any extraordinary difficulty, having very complete possession of many streets and of some of the public grounds of this city, the business of a public carrier until next Tuesday. It seems to me not a debatable proposition in the attitude of this measure to-day that it should be postponed until next Tuesday.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Massachusetts proceeding? The Chair hears none.

Mr. DAWES. I simply wish to make an inquiry. I have not been able to hear all this discussion, and I should like to inquire of the Senator from Illinois if there is any particular reason why the bill should be brought up to-day rather than a week from to-day. It may have been stated, but I have not heard it. If the Senator will indulge me by restating, if he has stated it already, any particular reason why it should be discussed to-day rather than a week from to-day, I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. CAMERON. Will the Senator permit me? Perhaps I can give him a reason. There are now pending in the courts of this District sixty suits against the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company for obstructing the streets by freight cars along the line of the road. These suits are being brought daily. They are a great annoyance and a great expense. If this bill passes the railroad company can remove their storage from the streets and put it on the property they have already purchased or will purchase in the future.

Mr. DAWES. What will transpire as to these suits between to-day and a week from to-day?

Mr. CAMERON. There will be no more such suits brought if they take the cars off the streets.

Mr. DAWES. I do not see that that changes the condition of things. So far as the Senator from Pennsylvania knows, it will be precisely the same a week off as it is to-day. Perhaps the Senator from Illinois can answer.

Mr. CAMERON. What are you trying to get at? [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators must address the Chair.

Mr. DAWES. I am trying to get at the bottom of this attempt to ride over all the usages and customs of the Senate, and I thought that perhaps there might be some paramount reason that could be stated why for the first time in my experience, as in that of the Senator from Wisconsin, all these usages are to be overridden. The Senator from Illinois who has charge of the bill of course knows why it is that he is trying to have it done to-day rather than a week from to-day.

Mr. FARWELL. If the question of removing stations was involved, or if the bringing in of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad was involved, I should have no objection to the postponement; but there seems to be an opposition to this bill to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad to buy certain property. I can not understand why it is opposed.

Mr. DAWES. I was prompted a little to this inquiry, I will say to the Senator in all frankness, by my memory. I remember a time when they could not wait an hour for the consideration of a measure somewhat kindred to this in the past, a measure which went into immediate effect and which I think the common judgment of everybody except those who have profited by it has regretted ever since. If there is, however, such a paramount reason that the Senator will state, I shall be governed by it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, and appeal to my friend from Illinois to agree to it, that this bill be postponed until Tuesday next and made a special order for that time, so that it will come up every day if it is not reached that day.

Mr. FARWELL. Prior to the other order?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to that—prior to the other order.

Mr. FARWELL. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the bill moved by the Senator from Illinois may be postponed until Tuesday next and made a special order for 2 o'clock on that day, taking precedence of all other and prior orders.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Standing at the head of the special orders for that day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRIS. I do not want to object and shall not object to any arrangement that may meet the approbation of the Senate; but it does seem to me so obviously proper that the other bill should be considered before this one——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I withdraw my request.

Mr. HARRIS. No; I am not going to object. I am hoping that the Senator from Illinois will not insist upon giving his bill priority to the other bill.

Mr. FARWELL. I desire a vote on this first. The other may be discussed; I do not care about that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to proceed to the consideration of this bill, the application of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] for unanimous consent being withdrawn.

The motion was not agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first order of business will be stated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

WITHDRAWAL OF A BILL.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the bill (S. 483) for the relief of E. R. Shipley. A general law has been passed and approved on the 9th of May, 1888, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act authorizing the Postmaster-General to adjust certain claims of postmasters for losses by burglary, fire, or other unavoidable casualty,' approved March 17, 1882." This bill is now pending before the Committee on Claims, and the law to which I have referred provides for its adjustment. Therefore I desire to withdraw it so that it will not be pending any longer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Claims may be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 483) for the relief of E. R. Shipley, and that it be indefinitely postponed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

BILLS RECONSIDERED.

Mr. SABIN. Senate bill 1480 was reported adversely by the Committee on Indian Affairs and indefinitely postponed. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed, and that it be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 1480) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to apply the unexpended balance of the appropriation made by the act entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain the amounts due to citizens of the United States for supplies furnished to the Sioux or Dakota Indians of Minnesota subsequent to June 1, 1861, and prior to the massacre of August, 1862, and providing for the payment thereof," approved March 3, 1885, now remaining in the Treasury, to the payment of interest on the sums found due by said Secretary under said act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks that the order of indefinite postponement be rescinded, and that the bill be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SABIN. I also make the same request in relation to the bill (S. 1576) for the relief of the heirs of Joseph Anderson.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order of indefinite postponement will be vacated and the bill placed on the Calendar if there be no objection.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. 6833) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year 1889; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 8394) to authorize United States marshals to arrest offenders and fugitives from justice in Indian Territory; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. BECK, the bill (H. R. 6833) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year 1889 was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

Mr. BLAIR. I call for the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (H. R. 8560) to establish a department of labor.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to call up Senate joint resolution No. 80 for the purpose of making some remarks upon it.

Mr. BLAIR. I feel obliged to insist on the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BLAIR. This bill has been in position some little time, and I desire to have it disposed of. I hope the Senator from Nevada will not ask to have it put aside for the purpose he suggests. I ask that the unfinished business be proceeded with.

Mr. STEWART. I desired to call up the joint resolution for the purpose of submitting some remarks thereon. Do I understand the Senator from New Hampshire to object?

Mr. BLAIR. I am not aware of any notice which the Senator has given of his desire to speak to-day. The labor bill will take but a short time. I have been at great inconvenience watching for an opportunity to dispose of it, and I hope the Senator will not ask to have it laid aside. It will not take a great while to dispose of the bill.

Mr. STEWART. I manifested my desire to make a few remarks in the morning hour, but there was not an opportunity on account of the consideration of other bills.

Mr. BLAIR. I think that I should submit to more inconvenience than the Senator if I assent to displacing the regular order. It can take but a short time to dispose of it, and I hope it may be proceeded with.

Mr. REAGAN. Is the bill to establish a department of labor up now?

Mr. BLAIR. It is the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand that the Senator from Nevada withdraws his request for unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the resolution which he has indicated?

Mr. REAGAN. I shall ask for the regular order.

Mr. STEWART. I withdraw my request, but give notice that to-morrow, after the routine morning business, I shall ask unanimous consent to call up the joint resolution (S. R. 80) proposing an amendment to subdivisions 2 and 3 of section 7 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States for the purpose of making some remarks thereon.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8560) to establish a department of labor.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, we have been met at the threshold of the discussion of the merits of the bill before us, for the establishment of a department of labor, by the statement that it passed the House of Representatives by a unanimous vote, and that it has the unanimous indorsement of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor. I think it right to state plainly at the outset that when a question about labor or agriculture or pensions comes before this Congress something more than the unanimous reports of committees and something more than the unanimous vote of either or both Houses of Congress is necessary to satisfy the demands of reason and of justice.

If the fathers and founders of the Republic could have been called back to life and could have witnessed much that has been said in the discussions in Congress on these questions for the last few years, they could hardly have failed to blush for shame on account of the degeneracy and want of manhood of their descendants in dealing with these questions.

There are two standpoints from which the "bill to establish a department of labor" and the amendments to it may be discussed.

First, from the standpoint of those who seek to secure the popular vote by misleading the laboring class.

Second, from the standpoint of patriotism, which seeks to protect the laboring classes against injustice because right and duty require this much.

The bills and amendments offered are apt to foreshadow the character of the discussion which is to follow.

The bill reported from the Committee on Education and Labor, now under consideration, "to establish a department of labor" needs but to be briefly analyzed to enable us to determine whether the purpose of it is to secure popular favor or to really benefit the laboring classes. To obtain a correct view of its real import we should inquire what object should be attained by the passage of such a law and how far that object is accomplished by existing laws.

The law of June 27, 1884, provides for the establishment of a bureau of labor in the Department of the Interior, to be under the charge of a commissioner of labor to be appointed by the President, to hold office for four years, and to receive a salary of $3,000 a year. He is required by this law to "collect information upon the subject of labor, and the earnings of laboring men and women, and the means of promoting their material, social, intellectual, and moral prosperity," and he is required to make an annual report of the information so collected and collated to the Secretary of the Interior, with such recommendations as he may deem calculated to promote the general efficiency of the bureau.

The powers here conferred are ample. They are all that could be desired or conferred to that end.

The bill reported by the committee provides for the establishment of a "department of labor," instead of a "Bureau of Labor," to be under the charge of a commissioner of labor, to be appointed by the President, to hold his office four years, and to receive a salary of $5,000 a year. This bill provides that he—

> Shall acquire and diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with labor, in the most general and comprehensive sense of that word, and especially upon its relation to capital, the hours of labor, the earnings of laboring men and women, and the means of promoting their material, social, intellectual, and moral prosperity.

The law of June 27, 1884, to which I have referred, and the bill reported by the committee have the same object in view, confer the same powers to carry that object into effect, and are of equal value to the laboring classes. Why, then, the proposed change? And what do the laboring people gain by the change? They get a law calling this "bureau" a "department;" paying an additional $2,000 a year to the officer who is to be at its head. And Hon. Carroll D. Wright, the present Commissioner of Labor, informs us in his official letter to the chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor, which has been read to the Senate, that the cost of this bureau under the present law is $108,000 per annum; and that its cost under the committee's bill would be $152,760, thus increasing the cost of this service to the extent of $44,760 a year for the same results.

I submit that this is too high a price to pay for a mere name, which secures no additional benefit to the class of persons it is assumed will be benefited by it. And if it is meant by this bill to make the laboring people believe that by it they get a Cabinet officer to represent their interests, it is to that extent a fraud on them, as the head of the "department of labor," as provided for in this bill, would not be a member of the President's Cabinet. He would only be the head of a sort of outside bureau.

The seventh section of the committee's bill gives some special directions about obtaining information as to the cost, etc., of dutiable articles, the profits of manufacturers, the cost of living, the effect of the tariff, the effect of the currency on agriculture, and mortgage indebtedness on farms, and the effect which trusts have had on limiting production and keeping up prices. This could be done under the authority of existing law. But if additional legislative direction is deemed necessary it could with as much convenience and propriety be given by an amendment to the present law as by the bill proposed by the committee, and this large increase of expense be saved. And if additional clerical force should be required for the purpose of carrying out additional legislative instructions, that could be provided for without going through the pretense of establishing a "department" which is no department in the sense of its head being a Cabinet officer.

I must regard this bill as a mere tub thrown to the labor whale, on the assumption that the laboring people have not information enough to understand that the mere change of the name of this bureau of information is not an answer to their demand for legislation which will protect them against the power and influence of employers and corporations and secure to them the full fruits of their labor.

Are the laborers, the wealth-producing classes of this country, to be treated as mere children? Are their cries for relief to be hushed by a bauble like the bill under consideration, which accomplishes nothing but a change of some of the machinery for collecting information?

Do Senators understand that the laboring people of this country have made any demand for the passage of such a law as this as answering the real complaints which they make? I must confess I have no such information. They have real grounds of complaint, and they have on many occasions and in many ways made those grounds of complaint known to the public. But I have never heard that they demanded a mere change of the machinery for collecting information about labor as being sufficient to satisfy their complaints.

Their complaint is that this Government has been run for a good many years past in the interest of railroad and banking and seal-fishery and other corporations; in the interest of bondholders and large capitalists; in the interest of extravagantly-protected manufacturers, for whose benefit they are taxed more than $47 on every hundred dollars' worth of taxed merchandise they buy; in the interest of a large retired-list of officers who draw high salaries and render no service. In short, that the Government has been run in the interest of specially favored classes ever since the Republican party got control of it, to the injury and oppression of those engaged in agriculture, in the mechanical arts, in labor, and in professional vocations, such as law, medicine, teaching, etc.

If Senators will call for specifications, the oppressed will point them to the years of unjust and unreasonable exactions and discriminations imposed on them by the railroad, telegraph, and express companies; to the unnecessary and prodigal squandering of more than a hundred million acres of the public land which ought to have been reserved for the use of actual settlers; to the tens of millions of money, principal and interest, unnecessarily taken from the people and given to the railroad corporations.

They will point also to the fact that during and directly after the war between the States the Government was under the necessity of putting a very large amount of legal-tender notes in circulation; that these notes, while they were a legal tender in payment of public and private indebtedness, became, as a result of causes beyond the control of the Government, and without the fault of any one, greatly depreciated; that in order to increase the value of these notes and bring them nearer to par the Government adopted the policy of reducing the volume of them by funding them into interest-bearing bonds, when to carry out this policy it had to allow speculators to purchase the bonds with this depreciated paper at par, although that paper was greatly below par, it being a part of the time not worth 50 cents in gold on the dollar; that these bonds were redeemable in lawful money, which, at that time, was gold and silver coin and legal-tender notes.

Up to this point in these matters the Government was doing the best that the circumstances enabled it to do, and no fault is imputed to its management. They will remind you that specie payment had been suspended, and so remained until the fall of 1878; that on the 1st of July, 1869, the public debt amounted to $2,588,452,213.94; that the State, municipal, corporate, and private indebtedness of the country was very great; that in this condition of things a Republican Congress passed and a Republican President approved the act of March 18, 1869, entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," in which it was declared that—

> The faith of the United States is pledged to the payment in coin, or its equivalent, of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligations has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver.

On the 1st of January, 1869, the amount of legal-tender notes in circulation was $355,892,975, which large sum was thus impaired in use and value.

The effect of this law was to take from the Government the right to pay its bonded indebtedness in the same kind of notes for which it sold them, though these notes had appreciated considerably in value, and to make the Government bonds payable in coin alone when specie payment was suspended, and when there was very little silver and gold in the country, to reduce the kinds and value of money out of which they might be redeemed, to greatly increase the value of the bonds and the difficulty of paying them, and to as greatly reduce, relatively, the value of the property and labor of the country out of which they were to be paid. This was an act passed in the interest of the money power, a violation of the faith of the Government to the people, which greatly increased their burdens and for which there could be no justification.

They will point to the fact that in 1873 the Republican Congress suspended the coinage of silver dollars of 412½ grains and provided that they should no longer be a legal tender for any sum above $5, and thus reduced the volume of metal money out of which the Government bonds might have been paid about one-half, again greatly increasing the value of the bonds, and by reducing the kinds and amount of money available for their payment they again greatly reduced, relatively, the value of the property and labor out of which these bonds had to be paid; and by this reduction of the volume of the currency they put it out of the power of the people to pay their private debts and their taxes. And for several years following this financial suicide in the interest of the moneyed classes bankruptcies were a most frequent occurrence, and vast amounts of land and other property were sold under the hammer for taxes. A pall spread over the country which would probably have produced a revolution in any other country than ours.

And a Republican Congress, as if not yet satisfied that it had shown sufficient contempt for the rights and interests of the people, and sufficient subserviency to the money and corporate classes, in 1875 provided for the redemption and cancellation of the $400,000,000 of outstanding legal-tender notes by the "act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," and to substitute for this circulating money the interest-bearing bonds of the Government, imposing this further burden on the tax-payers for the benefit of money-holders, bond-buyers, and bankers. And its third section repealed the laws which limited the aggregate amount of the circulating notes of the national banks to $354,000,000, and provided that banks might be organized and issue their notes without limit. They thus provided for retiring nearly $400,000,000 of legal-tender notes and converting them into an interest-bearing debt, in order to open the way for the banks to issue their notes and secure the profits on the use of this large sum of money.

Farmers, mechanics, laborers, and professional men of all sorts (for these are all laborers) might make further answer that there now lies in the Treasury of the United States $100,000,000 in gold which it is pretended is held for the redemption and cancellation of the outstanding legal-tender notes. This large sum of gold is withdrawn from the channels of commerce and from the use of the people for the benefit of the money classes and to the injury of the business of the country, in violation of the act of Congress of May 31, 1878, which provides—

That from and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, or other officer under him, to cancel or retire any more of the United States legal-tender notes. And when any of said notes may be redeemed or received into the Treasury under any law from any source whatever and shall belong to the United States, they shall not be retired, canceled, or destroyed, but they shall be reissued and paid out again and kept in circulation.

This act, the passage of which was secured mainly by Democratic influence and by Democratic votes, has been disregarded by the Treasury officials from the time of its passage. Congress by that act meant that these legal-tender notes were not thereafter to be regarded as a debt to be paid off at the earliest time practicable and to be converted into an interest-bearing debt to still further emburden the tax-payers of the country for the benefit of bankers and bondholders, but it did mean that they should constitute a part of the currency of the country to aid in its commerce and business and to reward the labor of the people. That large sum of gold lies there now idle and utterly useless, while the people of the rural parts of the country, indeed of all parts of the country away from the great centers of trade, are cramped in their business, distressed, and in need of a larger amount of circulating money.

Besides this, they might point to the accumulation of nearly $100,000,000 of surplus revenue accumulating in the Treasury annually, under a cruelly unjust system of taxation, withdrawn from the channels of trade, or squandered in corrupt and corrupting legislation; and to the fact that over $130,000,000 in addition to the $100,000,000 of gold just mentioned now lies idle in the Treasury.

And all the laboring and producing men and women of the country might point also to the following facts: that under a high protective tariff they are paying a tax of about $47 on every hundred dollars' worth of merchandise they buy of the classes which pay revenue to the Government; that the total value of imported merchandise for the year ended June 30, 1887, was $692,319,768; that the value of the taxed imports for the same year was $450,325,322; that the duty collected on the same was $212,032,224, being a little more than 47 per cent.; that the census of the United States of 1880 shows that the people of the United States manufactured that year articles of the value of about $5,500,000,000.

Let us assume that $4,000,000,000 worth of these manufactures were of the classes of taxed imports; and let us assume further that, when we tax the foreign product 47 per cent., the domestic manufacturers may add 47 per cent. to the selling price of his like product, and still undersell the foreign product by the cost of transportation to this country, and of handling, commissions, etc. At these rates, while the Government would receive its $212,032,424 from the tax on $450,325,322 worth of imports, the home manufacturers would be enabled to collect from the people $1,880,000,000 of tribute, year by year, from the American farmers, mechanics, laborers, professional people, merchants, and others; a sum equal to $500,000,000 more than the present public debt of the United States, not one dollar of which would go into the public Treasury to aid in the support of the Government and the payment of the public debt. All would be the tribute levied on American industry for the private benefit and enrichment of the millionaire manufacturers and the corporations of which they are members. But we should reduce this sum by the amount which would necessarily have to be paid them under a reasonable revenue tariff—say an average duty of 25 per cent; and we would still save to the people, after allowing a deduction of $1,000,000,000 transferred to the manufacturers under an average duty of 25 per cent., $880,000,000 a year.

Do you wonder, under existing circumstances, that granges, alliances, and labor organizations have come into organized existence, and that they are demanding the repeal of class legislation and special privileges? Do you wonder at their insisting that in their place we shall have just legislation protecting all citizens alike? Had we not better listen to their appeal now, and do justice voluntarily, than to go on in this career of wrong-doing until a condition of affairs shall be produced from which every good citizen may shrink with horror?

The people engaged in the various industrial pursuits in this country might also with propriety point to the fact that the class and monopoly interests of this country combine to secure and to prevent the repeal of legislation for their benefit. If we attempt to secure legislation to prevent extortionate charges and unjust discriminations by the railroad, the telegraph, and express companies, the friends of the national banks and of tariff protection will come to their relief. Whenever the national banks call for more legislation, or attempt, as they did in 1878, to defeat legislation for the good of the people, the protectionists, the railroad, telegraph, and express companies join hands with them in carrying out their purposes.

Thus we find the class interests of the country and the corporations banded together to promote their own schemes of aggrandizement and wealth, at the expense and to the great injury of the industrial and laboring classes. And when we attempt to reduce the burdens of excessive taxation on imports, the Representatives of the railroads and banks join the protectionists to resist such reduction.

Do Senators think that changing the name of a bureau of information is a sufficient remedy for all this, and that such an act will satisfy the just demands of the people?

The time was in the past history of this country when the public policy was formulated, the laws enacted, and the Executive Departments administered by Democrats.

Then the country was blessed with equal laws and just and honest administration. Then there was no class legislation. Then there were no grinding monopolies. Then there were no lawless trusts to limit production as a means of raising prices on the great staples of the country. Then there were no millionaires. Then every citizen was protected alike, and each interest was left to take care of itself, without special Government aid. Then there was no complaint of class, partial, and unjust legislation. The Government had the confidence and respect of the people. Then every citizen felt a patriotic pride in every portion of the country and in every legitimate interest in it. Then the laws were enacted and the Government administered in the interest of the whole people. Then we had no grange organization. Then we had no farmers' alliances. Then we had no Knights of Labor, no labor organizations, no strikes, no labor riots and destruction of property by men maddened by oppressions and wrongs.

Now, special and privileged classes, monopolies, and trusts struggle for the control of the Government as an instrument to aid them in monopolizing the wealth of the country and in impoverishing and degrading the great mass of the people. Money, selfishness, greed has taken the place of patriotism to a large extent, and as the saddest mark of the decadence of our patriotism, the consequence of the citizen is more frequently determined by the amount of his wealth than by his learning, his talents, or his virtues.

No one can more than myself deplore all this class legislation and all these class organizations. No one but an enemy of the Republic and of popular liberty can desire the continuance of either. I shall labor as faithfully as I can to abolish all class legislation, and I shall do what I can to discourage all class organizations for political purposes.

The Democracy as a party—I do not mean all its members, but the great body of the party—has steadily and on all occasions opposed all class legislation and monopolies. And after the Democrats got the control of the House of Representatives in 1875–'76, and ever since, they have been doing all they could to secure the repeal of such class legislation. In 1878 they, by the aid of some Republicans, secured the repeal of the law for the redemption and cancellation of the legal-tender notes, and preserved to the people about $346,000,000 of those notes as a part of the currency of the country. During the same year, by the like aid, they secured the passage of a law which provided for the coinage of not less than $2,000,000, nor more than $4,000,000 of silver a month. These two acts, due to Democratic policy, restored confidence in business, enabled the Government to resume specie payments, and were the largest factors in securing a return of prosperity after years of bankruptcy and ruin, brought about by the Republican policy of running the Government in the interest of corporations and monopolies.

And under Democratic policy, since the inauguration of President Cleveland, on the 4th of March, 1885, by acts of Congress and by the action of the Secretary of the Interior, 72,591,384 acres of land have been restored to the public domain, which had been claimed by railroad companies, individual entries canceled for fraud, private claims rejected, etc., an amount of land equal in area to the States of Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware, and more than one-half of the State of Maryland; and measures are in progress which will probably restore 22,808,927 acres more to the public domain, an amount nearly equal to the area of the State of Indiana. This is a gratifying illustration of the vigilance with which the Democracy guards the public domain for the benefit of actual settlers. And it shows that fraudulent appropriations of the public lands are not tolerated by a Democratic administration.

And during the administration of Mr. Cleveland the civil service has been improved, the expenditures of the Executive Departments reduced, and public confidence in the administration of the Executive Departments restored; and the President has given the country a clean, honest administration.

Congressional abuses and maladministration by the Executive Departments of the Government had become very common and notorious in past years, and the fact that the Democratic party has not yet had control of both branches of Congress and the Executive Departments at any time since the period of the complete ascendency of the Republican party, so as to be able to fully correct the abuses complained of, has caused many people to distrust the fidelity of the Democratic as well as the Republican party to their interest. To this cause is to be attributed the formation of many new political parties during the last ten or fifteen years.

The real significance of the formation of these new parties is that they are so many protests of parts of the American people against the past corrupt legislation of Congress and the maladministration of the Executive Departments, and because these people failed to understand the relative positions of the Republican and Democratic parties on these questions. If they had understood that the Democratic party—I do not mean every member of it, but the great body of that party—had opposed, as they did, all the vicious and oppressive legislation I have described, and that from the time it got the control of the House of Representatives in 1875-'76 up to this time it has secured the legislation and executive reforms which I have mentioned, and has done all it could, not having in its control all the machinery of Government, to secure other needed reforms in the interest of the people, I do not think these new political parties would have been organized; but I do believe much the greater portion of those who organized them, if they had rightly understood these facts, would have united with the Democracy, and would before this time have aided to put the Democratic party in control of both branches of Congress and of the Executive Departments, and would thus have assisted in securing a Government in the interest of the people, instead of one for the benefit of corporations, monopolies, trusts, protected manufacturers, bankers, and bondholders, and in restoring the Government and people to the condition of equality and contentment which existed for many decades of Democratic rule previous to the late war.

If those forming these new political parties and acting with them now sincerely desire relief and good government, I can not doubt that their true policy would be to disband them and unite with the Democratic party to secure the overthrow of the Republican party, which is responsible for the evils complained of. If they desire the defeat of the Democratic party, by division of its forces, and the re-establishment of the Republican party in power, one of the ways to accomplish that end is to draw as many voters as they can away from that party by the formation of new political parties.

I feel that the line of argument I have been presenting is necessary to a full understanding of the subject before us, and to a proper consideration of the bill and amendments.

In order to determine what is our duty to do in reference to this bill and amendments, we must consider what is needed and what is expected of us.

The agricultural interests of the country have been demanding for years that that great interest should be under the care and supervision of a Cabinet officer and an intellect of the first order.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to state that several days ago the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate reported a similar bill, which is now on the Calendar awaiting the action of the Senate?

Mr. REAGAN. I was not aware of that.

I will observe here that this morning a bill has been announced to the Senate as having passed the other House for the organization of an executive department of agriculture with a Cabinet officer at its head.

The commercial interests of the country have for several years been making a similar demand in behalf of our immense internal and foreign commerce.

And now there comes before us a bill to organize a department of labor; and no doubt if the laboring people are demanding a department of labor, about which I have no information beyond what is implied from the appearance of such a bill, they too will expect to have a member of the President's Cabinet to supervise and protect their great interests.

Will Congress create an executive department for each of these important interests? If not, will it create such a department for any one of them; and if so, which of them, and shall the others be left unprovided for in this respect?

I do not believe the country is prepared for the creation of three new executive departments, nor do I believe it would sanction the creation of such a department exclusively for the labor interests of the country, great as they are; but I do believe the best interests of the country would be subserved by the creation of one new executive department, under whose control and direction all of these great interests and others should be placed.

And to this end I have, in the absence of my friend the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA], offered a bill prepared by him two or three years back, as a substitute for the bill reported by the committee. The object of this substitute is to secure the establishment of "a department of industries," in which there shall be a division of agriculture, to be superintended by a commissioner of agriculture to be appointed by the President, and to receive a salary of $5,000 a year. The powers conferred and the duties devolved on the proposed division of agriculture will be best understood by my reading the third section of the bill.

Section three is as follows:

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of collecting and disseminating all important and useful information concerning agriculture, and also concerning such scientific matters and industrial pursuits as relate to the interests of agriculture, the secretary of industries shall organize the following bureaus in the division of agriculture, namely:

First. The bureau of agricultural products, which shall include divisions of botany, entomology, and chemistry; and the chief of which bureau, who shall be a practical agriculturist, shall investigate the modes of farming in the several States and Territories, and shall report such practical information as shall tend to increase the profits of the farmer respecting the various methods; the crops most profitable in the several sections; the preferable varieties of seeds, vines, plants, and fruits; fertilizers; implements; buildings; and similar matters.

Second. The Bureau of Animal Industry, to be in charge of a competent veterinary surgeon, who shall investigate and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States; their protection, growth, and use; the causes, prevention, or cure of contagious, communicable, or other diseases; and the kinds, mees, or breeds best adapted to the several sections for profitable raising.

Third. The bureau of lands, the chief of which shall investigate and report upon the resources or capabilities of the public or other lands for farming, stock-raising, timber, manufacturing, mining, or other industrial uses. And all powers and duties vested in the commission now known as the Geological Survey, together with all clerks, employés, and agents, and all instruments, records, books, papers, and so forth, are hereby transferred to the department of industries. And the secretary of industries shall institute such investigations and collect and report such information, facts, and statistics relative to the mines and mining of the United States, and facilities for their ventilation and general operation as may be deemed of value and importance.

Section 4 of this substitute provides for the transfer of the Bureau of Statistics from the Treasury Department to the proposed department of industries. And it somewhat enlarges the duties of that bureau. It is as follows:

SEC. 4. That, in addition to the duties imposed by chapter 10, Title VII of the Revised Statutes, the secretary of industries shall cause to be collected and report the agricultural statistics of the United States; and, in addition, all important information or statistics relating to industrial education and agricultural colleges; to markets and prices; to modes and cost of transporting agricultural products and live-stock to their final market; to the demand, supply, and prices in foreign markets; to the location, number, and products of manufacturing establishments of whatever sort, their sources of raw material, methods, markets, cost of transportation, and prices; to such commercial or other conditions as may affect the market value of farm products or the interests of the industrial classes of the United States. And the secretary is hereby authorized to establish such divisions in this bureau, and to make such monthly or other reports as he shall deem most effective for the prompt dissemination of such reliable information respecting crops and domestic and foreign markets as will be of service to the farmers, miners, mechanics, laborers, or other industrialists of the United States.

For a full understanding of this section chapter 10 of Title VII of the Revised Statutes should be read.

The fifth section of this substitute provides for the transfer of the Bureau of Labor from the Department of the Interior to the proposed department of industries. The duties of this bureau are prescribed by the "act to establish a bureau of labor," of June 27, 1884 (Laws, volume 23, page 60), with some enlargement of the force of the office and of its duties as prescribed by the act of Congress of July 31, 1886 (Laws, volume 24, page 202), making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ended June 30, 1887, and as prescribed by the act of March 3, 1887 (Laws, volume 24, page 625), making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1888.

If it is thought necessary to confer additional powers on this bureau, that can be done by amending the substitute bill if adopted. The sixth section of the substitute which I offer provides for the establishment of a division of commerce in the department of industries, to be under the superintendence of a commissioner of commerce, to be appointed by the President, who is to receive a salary of $5,000 a year. That section is as follows:

SEC. 6. That there shall be in the department of industries a division of commerce, and to superintend said division a commissioner of commerce, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum.

Sections 7 and 8 of the substitute provide for the transfer of a number of the bureaus now in the Treasury Department to the proposed department of industries, and are as follows:

SEC. 7. That all divisions and subdivisions, bureaus or parts thereof, heretofore attaching to the Treasury Department by virtue of the provisions of chapter 10 of Title VII of the Revised Statutes, relating to the Bureau of Statistics, which shall hereafter be known as the bureau of external commerce; Title XLVIII, relating to commerce and navigation; Title XLIX, relating to the regulation of vessels in foreign commerce; Title L, relating to the regulation of vessels in domestic commerce; Title LII, relating to the regulation of steam-vessels; Title LVI, relating to the Coast Survey; Title LV, relating to lights and buoys; sections 4801, 4802, 4803, 4804, 4805, and 4806, of chapter 1, Title LIX, relating to hospital relief for seamen; and chapter 265 of the acts of the Forty-fifth Congress, second session, relating to the Life-Saving Service, or by virtue of any law amendatory of said several provisions or regulations in pursuance thereof, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be parts of the division of commerce in the department of industries; and the secretary of industries shall establish in said division of commerce a bureau of internal commerce, to be organized and governed as other bureaus in said division.

Section 8 provides—

That all duties involving upon the Secretary of the Treasury by virtue of the several provisions mentioned in the preceding section shall, from and after the passage of this act, be performed by the secretary of industries. The authority conferred and the duties imposed by said several provisions upon the Register of the Treasury shall, from and after the passage of this act, be exercised and discharged by the commissioner of commerce. All bonds authorized by any of the provisions aforesaid to be made payable to the Register of the Treasury shall, from and after the passage of this act, be made payable to the commissioner of commerce.

Then the ninth section of the bill provides—

That section 158, Title IV, of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the words: "Eighth. The department of industries."

Which is to make the eighth Cabinet officer.

All who are at all familiar with the business of the Treasury Department will recognize the fact that those duties which appertain exclusively to the finances of the country are sufficient to give full employment to any person who may fill the office of Secretary, however great his abilities; and that the transfer of the bureaus named in section 7 to the department of industries would be a necessary relief to him, while it would give the interests which come under the control of those bureaus a chance for the advantage of the supervision of an officer of first-class ability and a member of the Cabinet of the President. As it is now, any one who will consult the Secretary of the Treasury will find that it is physically impossible for him to give personal attention to any great extent to the business of these bureaus; and that the duties pertaining to them have to be left largely to the discretion of the chiefs of these several bureaus.

The ninth section of this substitute provides that the secretary of industries shall be a Cabinet officer.

This substitute would marshal together in one department the great industrial interests of the country, would place them under the supervision of a member of the President's Cabinet, and would secure to these industries and to the public all the advantages which can at present reasonably be desired, and would at the same time reduce considerably the onerous duties now imposed on the Secretary of the Treasury and on the Secretary of the Interior.

It would give to the agriculture, the labor, and the commerce of the country some real advantages they do not now possess; and it would tend to prevent the further annual appeals of those seeking popularity at the expense of principle, for the support of others whose highest idea of statesmanship is the supposed promotion of class interests at the expense of others. I propose this substitute not because I am opposed to so much of the purpose of the committee's bill as looks to the promotion of the welfare of the laboring classes of people, but because by the adoption of this substitute, while preserving all the interests of labor, we will promote the welfare of all the productive occupations of the country and satisfy the reasonable demand of those engaged in agriculture and commerce, as well as really benefit labor. Whatever the legislation of Congress can properly do to secure profit and honor to honest toil shall have my cordial support. But when labor asks for bread I will not consent to give it a stone like the bill before us.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask for a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Texas to propose an amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert what I send to the desk, and if that shall be adopted I shall afterwards ask to change the title of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That there shall be at the seat of Government an executive department to be known as the department of industries, and a secretary of industries, who shall be the head thereof.

SEC. 2. That there shall be in the department of industries a division of agriculture, and to superintend said division a commissioner of agriculture, who shall be a practical agriculturist, and who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall be entitled to receive a salary of $5,000 per annum.

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of collecting and disseminating all important and useful information concerning agriculture, and also concerning such scientific matters and industrial pursuits as relate to the interests of agriculture, the secretary of industries shall organize the following bureaus in the division of agriculture, namely:

First. The bureau of agricultural products, which shall include divisions of botany, entomology, and chemistry, and the chief of which bureau, who shall be a practical agriculturist, shall investigate the modes of farming in the several States and Territories, and shall report such practical information as shall tend to increase the profits of the farmer respecting the various methods; the crops most profitable in the several sections; the preferable varieties of seeds, vines, plants, and fruits; fertilizers; implements; buildings; and similar matters.

Second. The Bureau of Animal Industry, to be in charge of a competent veterinary surgeon, who shall investigate and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States; their protection, growth, and use; the causes, prevention, or cure of contagious, communicable, or other diseases; and the kinds, races, or breeds best adapted to the several sections for profitable raising.

Third. The bureau of lands, the chief of which shall investigate and report upon the resources or capabilities of the public or other lands for farming, stock-raising, timber, manufacturing, mining, or other industrial uses. And all powers and duties vested in the commission now known as the Geological Survey, together with all clerks, employés, and agents, and all instruments, records, books, papers, etc., are hereby transferred to the department of industries. And the secretary of industries shall institute such investigations and collect and report such information, facts, and statistics relative to the mines and mining of the United States, and facilities for their ventilation and general operation, as may be deemed of value and importance.

SEC. 4. That in addition to the duties imposed by chapter 10, Title VII, of the Revised Statutes, the secretary of industries shall cause to be collected and report the agricultural statistics of the United States; and, in addition, all important information or statistics relating to industrial education and agricultural colleges; to markets and prices; to modes and cost of transporting agricultural products and live-stock to their final market; to the demand, supply, and prices in foreign markets; to the location, number, and products of manufacturing establishments of whatever sort, their sources of raw material, methods, markets, cost of transportation, and prices; to such commercial or other conditions as may affect the market value of farm products or the interests of the industrial classes of the United States. And the secretary is hereby authorized to establish such divisions in this bureau, and to make such monthly or other reports as he shall deem most effective for the prompt dissemination of such reliable information respecting crops and domestic and foreign markets, as will be of service to the farmers, miners, mechanics, laborers, or other industrialists of the United States.

SEC. 5. That there shall be in the department of industries a division of labor, which shall be under the superintendence of the Commissioner of Labor; and the Bureau of Labor, as provided for in chapter 127 of the acts of the Forty-eighth Congress, with its officers and duties, shall be transferred from the Department of the Interior to the department of industries.

SEC. 6. That there shall be in the department of industries a division of commerce, and to superintend said division a commissioner of commerce, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum.

SEC. 7. That all divisions and subdivisions, bureaus or parts thereof, heretofore attaching to the Treasury Department by virtue of the provisions of chapter 10, of Title VII, of the Revised Statutes, relating to the Bureau of Statistics, which shall hereafter be known as the bureau of external commerce; Title XLVIII, relating to commerce and navigation; Title XLIX, relating to the regulation of vessels in foreign commerce; Title L, relating to the regulation of vessels in domestic commerce; Title LII, relating to the regulation of steam-vessels; Title LVI, relating to the Coast Survey; Title LV, relating to lights and buoys; sections 4801, 4802, 4803, 4804, 4805, and 4806, of chapter 1, Title LIX, relating to hospital relief for seamen; and chapter 265 of the acts of the Forty-fifth Congress, second session, relating to the Life-Saving Service, or by virtue of any law amendatory of said several provisions, or regulations in pursuance thereof, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be parts of the division of commerce in the Department of industries; and the secretary of industries shall establish in said division of commerce a bureau of internal commerce, to be organized and governed as other bureaus in said division.

SEC. 8. That all duties devolving upon the Secretary of the Treasury by virtue of the several provisions mentioned in the preceding section shall, from and after the passage of this act, be performed by the secretary of industries. The authority conferred and the duties imposed by said several provisions upon the Register of the Treasury shall, from and after the passage of this act, be exercised and discharged by the commissioner of commerce. All bonds authorized by any of the provisions aforesaid to be made payable to the Register of the Treasury shall, from and after the passage of this act, be made payable to the commissioner of commerce.

SEC. 9. That section 158, Title IV, of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the words: "Eighth. The department of industries."

SEC. 10. That this act shall not be construed to interfere with the present organization of the various Departments, divisions, subdivisions, and bureaus embraced herein, except with reference to the transfer thereof to the department of industries, subject to the general provisions of law relating to regulations in the various Departments of the Government and appointments to office therein.

SEC. 11. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

Mr. BLAIR. I merely wish to say that this is a substitute for the bill, very much larger in its scope than the bill, and I hope it will not be adopted.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again read.

Mr. BLAIR. The amendment is very long. It has just been read. It is an amendment proposing to establish a department of industry, including agriculture, labor, commerce, and all that.

Mr. MANDERSON. A substitute for the present bill?

Mr. BLAIR. It is moved as a substitute for the present bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not care about the reading of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll-call will proceed.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLQUITT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS].

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON]. I do not know how he would vote if present, and therefore I withhold my vote.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. SPOONER. The absence of my colleague [Mr. SAWYER] from the Chamber is caused by the death of his wife, and will continue perhaps for a week or ten days. During his absence he is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BERRY. I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN].

Mr. BROWN. I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER].

Mr. VEST. Has the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not responded to his name.

Mr. VEST (after having voted in the affirmative). I withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. MANDERSON (after having voted in the affirmative). When I voted I did not notice the absence from the Chamber of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], and therefore I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BATE. My colleague [Mr. HARRIS] is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

The result was announced—yeas 9, nays 27; as follows:

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REAGAN. As the sense of the Senate is manifestly opposed to the amendment, I do not think it worth while to have further delay, and I withdraw it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have no quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Nothing can be done until the presence of a quorum is ascertained.

The roll-call was continued, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum being present, the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] asks unanimous consent, the yeas and nays having been ordered, to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On page 4 of the bill, section 7, line 15, I move to strike out the word "tariff" and insert "customs laws." There is no such word as "tariff" known to our legislation.

Mr. BLAIR. Unless that is a vital thing to do I hope the Senator will not press the amendment. It will cause a sending back of the bill to the other House, and I think the meaning of the bill is quite apparent without making the change. I hope the Senator will not insist on the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no such thing known in the laws of the United States as a tariff, but I would say to my friend from New Hampshire as a mere question of taste, this being a House bill, if there were no other amendment needed I would not insist on this; but if my friend looks down two or three or four or five lines beyond, he will find that the question of trusts as it is there is rather—I will not say industriously and purposely—put in a way which narrows the inquiry into the combinations of capital, business, and labor, etc., so as to make it entirely one-sided and ineffectual. If the bill is to go so as to really mean something—and I hope it is intended to mean something—it must be amended; otherwise this commission or department of labor or industry, or whatever it is called, will find itself limited in its jurisdiction in a way that will not enable it to get at the truth. So I propose to amend the bill, when we get down to the next part of it, so as to cover all combinations of capital, of business operations, and of labor, so as to give this department the power to make a complete investigation of the whole subject. The word "trusts," I should have said, is so used in the bill as to be a device to leave everybody out who does not go under the name of a trust.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], in section 7, line 15, to strike out "tariff" and insert "customs laws."

Mr. BLAIR. I make no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I move to amend, in line 19 of the same section, after the word "trusts" where it first occurs, by inserting the words:

Or other combinations of capital, business operations, or labor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated from the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 19 of section 7, after the first word "trusts," it is proposed to insert the words:

Or other combinations of capital, business operations, or labor.

So as to read:

And what articles are now controlled by trusts, or other combinations of capital, business operations, or labor, and what effect, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I now move to amend by adding, after the word "trusts" where it occurs the second time, in line 19, the words:

Or other combinations of capital, business operations, or labor.

So as to read:

And what effect said trusts or other combinations of capital, business operations, or labor have had on limiting production and keeping up prices.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object to it. I do not want to offer any factious opposition; but I put in a caveat against a paragraph in the law using the words "business operations." I do mean to say that this is beyond what I expected to come from the State of Vermont.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move, in line 18, of the same section, to strike out the word "now," so as to give this commissioner the power to make an inquiry that is not limited to what has taken place before the passage of this law, but is a general power so long as the law stands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated from the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 18 of section 7, before the word "controlled," it is proposed to strike out "now;" so as to read:

And what articles are controlled by trusts or other combinations, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move, in line 19, with the same purpose, to strike out the word "had" after the word "have."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 19 of section 7, after the word "have," it is proposed to strike out the word "had;" so as to read:

And what effect said trusts or other combinations of capital, business operations, or labor have on limiting production and keeping up prices.

Mr. HOAR. I think the amendment of the Senator from Vermont being made, there should be stricken out of the nineteenth line the words "limiting" and "keeping up," so that the report of the commissioner shall be as to the general effect on prices and on production, whether limiting or increasing. In a case where the commissioner finds that what is known by rather a cant name as an improper and selfish combination intended to secure an artificial and injurious effect, a monopolizing effect, has succeeded in its object, it would be well enough to imply that the effect would be to raise prices; but when you extend it to all combinations of capital, a great many of which are harmless, it would seem hardly fair that if the investigation shows that such an arrangement, as for example, a joint stock company, does result in reducing prices that he should not be at liberty to make the fact known. We want the fact whatever it is. So I move to strike out, in line 19 of section 7, the word "limiting," and the words "keeping up" in line 20; so as to make the language:

And what effects said trusts or other combinations of capital, business operations, or labor have on production and prices.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts is entirely correct, and I agree with it in every respect; and if he had not made the suggestion I should have moved next to strike out the words "limiting production and keeping up," and insert "in respect of."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, which has just been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I move, with the consent of my friend from Massachusetts and on his suggestion, to strike out the words beginning in line 19, "limiting production and keeping up," and insert "on production and;" so as to read:

And what effect said trusts or other combinations of capital, business operations, or labor have on production and prices.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment just moved by the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TURPIE. I offer the following amendment to the pending bill as a new section:

SEC. —. It shall be the duty of the commissioner annually to compile from the best and most authentic sources and to prepare and publish a book, to be called the "Register of Labor," to be of the size of the Army and Navy Register combined, to contain the names and address, selected and alphabetically arranged with reference to occupation, of persons of known excellence in the vicinity in any line of skilled labor or mechanism, the names to be taken in proportion to population from the different States and Territories and District of the Union, said register to contain only the names of persons actually engaged in the manual work of their respective callings. The list to be carefully revised each year; no name to be dropped from the register as long as the person is known to be engaged as above provided; loss in the list by death or other causes to be replaced by other names taken from the same locality. The number of said books published for the use of Congress to be twice the number authorized to be published of the Army and Navy Register in any year. The expenses of said publication to be ascertained and certified by the commissioner, and paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. President, in relation to the amendment I have offered I desire to submit a few observations. I should like to know of what great practical use is it that there is given the information, which is being published year after year at the public expense and furnished to the members of the National Legislature and to others, that Andrew Jackson Jones, or Robinson is second lieutenant in the Army or assistant surgeon in the Navy? Nevertheless there is a certain demand for this kind of information. In the first place, those engaged in the Army and Navy use these books, and then there are others who use them for the purpose of forming a general acquaintance with naval or army affairs, and there are others who have relatives or friends in the service who use the book occasionally for the purpose of learning their whereabouts; and once in a while they are consulted and perhaps even read by the general reader. I think this demand for the Army and Navy Register is entirely normal and natural. It is certainly not excited by any artifice of puffing or of advertisement.

Mr. HOAR. I wish the Senator from Indiana, before he proceeds, would allow his amendment to be read from the Secretary's desk. I was not able to catch it from his reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. TURPIE. I was remarking that the demand for the Register of the Army and Navy was perfectly natural; at least it is not excited by any artifice of puffing or literary advertisement. In the numerous book notices and articles of literary criticism I have seen no line of praise or censure concerning the Army or Navy Register. Its perusal is confined, nevertheless, to a limited circle of readers.

I am not objecting to that class of books as at present ordered and allowed by law; but the claim, however, is that the publication authorized by this amendment would be of a much more practical character and would insure the attention of a much more numerous class of readers. As for instance, in regard to skilled laborers, persons who have a desire to keep up an acquaintance with them, the persons who have friends and relatives engaged in the same, and the general reader who may take or have some concern in the useful arts—all these would make a very much larger number of readers or of those who might have occasion to use by way of reference such books than can possibly be found for the Register of the Army or Navy.

The Army and Navy Registers do not contain the names of all those engaged in the military and naval service of the United States. They contain only a very small minority of the persons so engaged; only those thought to be worthy of such notice and recognition. In the same way the register of labor would not contain the names of all the persons who are engaged even in skilled labor, even in works of mechanism, but it would be a representation of that element, as the Army and Navy Registers are of the military and naval elements in the country.

The register of labor would be a public representation of all those who are so engaged, of the numberless legions and divisions of labor, in the presence of whose mighty achievements the proudest exploits of the sword pale their ineffectual fires. It would be a representation of that vast constituency composing the republic of the arts, a commonwealth whose boundaries transcend the limits of race, of language, of nationality, which girds the whole world of civilization in its kindly grasp. It is on account of such a representation, especially in a Government like ours, really democratic in its origin, republican in its teachings and traditions, that even what little may be done by the aggrandizement of this great element will be to ourselves as legislators becoming, to the persons so noticed grateful, to the whole mass of the people advantageous, profitable.

Such a list would enable a person wishing himself to engage or to employ others in mechanism, in skilled work in the structure of any kind of edifice, aqueduct, bridge, or artificial way, in the use or preparation of any material or machinery, to consult it first hand with those experienced in and acquainted with such work, as with their daily cares and toil. It would not be an advertisement of a magnificent incorporated association; it would not be a census containing the names of all those engaged in any particular industry; it would not be a directory containing the names of all those engaged in handicrafts in a particular locality; but it would be a list of notables, a list of actual workers near the sources of thought and of action that keep the frame and form of society in motion from day to day.

I know a certain artificer in wood, a poor, plain man, a carver working from day to day, a carver rich in device, of most shrewd and excellent fancy. I know him only by accident. He is totally unknown outside of the establishment in which he is employed, hardly known in the street in which he lives. The name of such a man should find its place on this record, with profit thereby to himself and others.

I do not speak now of the artist, nor of the discoverer, nor of the inventor. I speak of the workman who excels in well-known methods. Centuries ago we might go and see the artisan at work in his own shop. The most renowned smiths in silver, in gold, in iron, the most celebrated weaver or spinner in the textiles, in wool, in linen; we might notice them handling their material, see the eyes with which they watched, and the deft fingers with which they touched this material growing into forms of beauty before us. We can do so now no longer. Such a man now is hidden away in the recesses of a factory of some vast corporation. Of course he is highly prized by those who employ him, and he may be known to a very few intimate personal acquaintances and associates, but his excellence as an artisan, the fact that he excels as a worker, his name, fame, and identity are utterly lost and destroyed in that of the establishment in which he labors.

It is to bring out such a man individually and to rescue the man himself from this obscurity and give him some little prominence that this register will be useful. Perhaps the name of such a man on this register would do him no particular honor, but the publication of such names might be beneficial, and no better motive could move a legislative body. We have ourselves put in such a category as Senators or Members of the House of Representatives in the Congressional Directory, and is there not as much reason why publicity should be given in the one case as in the other?

It may be answered that if a person either wished to engage himself or to employ others in some skilled work of mechanism he might go to a friend who had some similar work or acquaintance with such a class, or if he had no near neighbors he might write to a city or a town where there were such and get the information. He might write to the postmaster of the town. Very truly, he might; and allow me to say that a person in this humor, whether the man of whom I speak or the gentlemen around him to whom I alluded, writing to learn about a second lieutenant in the Fifth Regiment of the Regular Cavalry, if there be such a regiment, might write to the Secretary of War to learn whether such a person was in the service, and if so what his rank was and what his present locality.

Would that be assigned by any one here as a reason for doing away with the Army or the Navy Register? What, I should like to inquire, would be the fate of any one who should propose, not to prohibit, but even here seriously to diminish the number of those valuable books now published by Congress? There would be an instant remonstrance from the commander-in-chief down to the lowest subaltern in the rank and file.

I do not object, as I said before, to those books already authorized, nor to the expenditure occasioned by them. but I do insist that the publications named in this amendment would be quite as worthy of the public expenditure as those now made.

It is true mistakes might occur in this register as in other registers, but allow me to say that the whole registry list would be submitted to the criticism of a thousand eyes, and that the real workers, the mass of workmen in this country, are chivalrous in their nature, willing to do homage to truth, hating above everything sham and imposition, and it would not be long before the register would become known as the select list, as the correct category of workers and laborers worthy of their fame and of their high position.

Only the first publication of it would be very laborious or expensive. Revisions afterwards would not be so, and mistakes in it could be corrected without the delay or the expense of a court of inquiry or a court-martial.

I think such a register would be of very valuable assistance to the proposed business of this new department in the performance of their functions. We must have information in order to have intelligent legislation, and this list of names would place the department itself in communication with a large number of persons nearly and personally interested in the success of their work, and it would also afford a field and scope for correspondence between these workers themselves, both of which ends and purposes are certainly worthy of the consideration of the National Legislature.

I favor the passage of this bill, and I trust that the amendment or some similar provision to the one now offered will prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE].

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is a good deal that is valuable in the amendment of the Senator from Indiana; but I think as it stands it is inadequate to the purpose he has in view; for instance, in respect of publication. It leaves an unlimited capacity on the part of the Commissioner of Labor to publish a million copies, if he wishes to do so. I do not think that the arrangement of the list of persons named therein is such as to define the extent to which it may go, etc.

I should hope that the amendment might be printed and the bill go over until to-morrow, so that we may be able to see precisely what it is and make such suggestions of improvement as might be thought wise at that time. I therefore suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill to let it go over.

Mr. BLAIR. I suppose that this is a facetious amendment, and I have not the slightest idea that the Senator from Indiana was indulging in making anything but a very sharp specimen of ridicule of the Army and Navy Register. If he is in earnest, that is another question; but if the Senator from Indiana is in earnest, or if the Senator from Vermont is in earnest in undertaking to perfect it, I do not see how it is possible to make out a register of the laborers of the country when the choice of names will be affected by any tribunal whose decision would be likely to be satisfactory or whose decision would be in any way made more satisfactory by the subsequent formal revision to which the Senator alludes.

Such a measure as this, if it were to be adopted, I think ought to make its appearance here in the form of a separate bill, and it would require much consideration to put it in such a form as to be satisfactory to anybody. If properly limited and the selections made by competent tribunals, I can conceive that such a register would be of great value, and that to be upon its pages might be an immortal honor.

I do not object, I should not think of objecting, to any development of the idea, provided that development be made adequately, with sufficient consideration, but I hope the Senator from Indiana will not insist upon its being made a part of this bill, which is simply designed to facilitate the operations of the existing bureau somewhat, which finds itself considerably fettered by its present limitations, requiring some addition to its working force and greater convenience and freedom in the movement or action of its internal machinery.

If the Senator from Indiana is in earnest and desires to press the amendment as an amendment to this bill, that is another thing; but as a friend of the measure and in the hope that we may get some legislation, I should be very glad if the bill might not be embarrassed with additional amendments. The verbal changes which have been made on the suggestions of the Senators from Vermont and Massachusetts will of course compel the bill to be returned to the other House, which I regret, because I do not consider those changes of much importance any way; but at the same time, being merely verbal amendments, I think they would be agreed to by the other House without much ceremony and would not require debate. But I think an amendment like the one suggested by the Senator from Indiana would be likely to lead to debate and it might lead to the defeat of the bill in toto, as the session is approaching its close, or if not its close, it is of course becoming full of other important measures awaiting and demanding consideration. Does the Senator from Indiana desire to insist upon this as an amendment to the pending bill?

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana offered the amendment. He desires to insist upon it in no other way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

The amendment was rejected.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. BLAIR, Mr. WILSON of Iowa, and Mr. GEORGE were appointed.

POTEAU RIVER BRIDGE, IN ARKANSAS.

On motion of Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, it was Resolved, That the House of Representatives be requested to return to the Senate Senate bill 1948, to provide for the building of a bridge across the Poteau River, in the Indian Territory.

CONSIDERATION OF THE CALENDAR.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that to-morrow the Calendar be proceeded with under the rule we have been acting upon for the last few days, subject to executive business or privileged business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, at the close of the routine morning business, the consideration of the Calendar under Rule VIII be resumed. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRIS. And continued during the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And continued during the day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Subject to executive matters.

Mr. SHERMAN. Subject to a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business, as in other cases.

Mr. HARRIS. Subject to all the provisions of Rule VIII.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

BRIDGE AT NEBRASKA CITY.

Mr. PADDOCK. The Senate this morning took up the bill (S. 2674) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Nebraska City, Nebr., and for other purposes, and proceeded to its consideration. The bill was read at length and was laid aside temporarily because the printed amendments proposed by the Committee on Commerce were not in the possession of the Senate. They are now in the hands of the clerks, and I should be glad if those amendments could be considered and the bill disposed of.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the Committee on Commerce will be stated in their order.

The first amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 2, line 17, after the word "Provided," to strike out:

That if the said bridge shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans, it shall have three or more channel spans, and shall not be of less elevation in any case than 50 feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the bottom chord of the bridge, nor shall the spans of said bridge be less than 300 feet in length, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of said river, and the main span shall be over the main channel of the said river and not less than 300 feet in length: And provided also, That if any bridge built under this act shall be constructed as a drawbridge, the same shall be constructed as a pivot drawbridge, with a draw over the main channel of the river at an accessible and navigable point, and with spans not less than 160 feet in length in the clear on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw, and the next adjoining span or spans to the draw shall not be less than 300 feet, and the head-room under such span shall not be less than 10 feet above high-water mark: And provided also, That said draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passing of boats.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That the said bridge shall be built as a high bridge with unbroken and continuous spans, having at least one channel-span of not less than 400 feet clear channel-way, all other spans over the water way to have a clear channel-way of not less than 300 feet, and all spans shall have a clear head-room of not less than 50 feet above high-water mark, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of said river and the bridge itself at right angles thereto, and no riprapping or other protection for imperfect foundations which will lessen the required water way shall be permitted.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire simply to state that this amendment is made on the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, who objected to a low bridge. In the face of that objection I see no propriety in undertaking to have his recommendation set aside. Therefore I assent to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 17, after the word "in," to strike out "which" and insert "whose jurisdiction;" so as to read:

And in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river caused or alleged to be caused by said bridge, the case may be brought in the circuit court of the United States for the State of Nebraska or the State of Iowa in whose jurisdiction any portion of said obstruction or bridge may be located.

Mr. FRYE. These are committee amendments?

Mr. PADDOCK. They are.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert, after section 5, a new section, as follows:

SEC. 6. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date thereof.

Mr. PADDOCK. In line 3, after the word "within," I move to strike out "one year" and insert "two years;" and in the same line, before the word "years," to strike out "three" and insert "four;" so as to read:

Commenced within two years and completed within four years.

This amendment I move with the assent of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend section 6—the "6" being stricken out, so that it is "7" as it now stands—by striking out all after the word "act," in line 2. The present statement of that section is that "Congress shall have power at any time to alter, amend, or repeal this act, so as to prevent or remove all material and substantial obstructions," etc. I wish to leave it as we do in all these acts, an absolute power in Congress to control the whole matter.

Mr. PADDOCK. That is perfectly satisfactory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The part proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section [6] 7, line 2, after the word "act," it is proposed to strike out the words:

So as to prevent or remove all material and substantial obstructions to the navigation of said river by the construction of said bridge and its necessary works; and the expense of altering said bridge or removing such obstructions shall be at the expense of the owners of or persons controlling said bridge.

So that when amended the section will read:

That Congress shall have power at any time to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I now move to amend by inserting at the end of section 3 part of the words that were stricken out on my motion just now, so that if the act is not entirely repealed and the change is necessary it will be at the expense of the company. I move, therefore, to add, as a new paragraph, at the end of section 3 as it stands in the bill, these words:

And the expense of altering said bridge or removing any obstructions to navigation in respect thereof shall be paid by the owners of or persons controlling said bridge.

That is to be a separate paragraph at the end of the section, as a part of it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH YANKTON RESERVATION.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senate to take up Senate bill 2315. It will create no discussion.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2315) granting the right of way to the Yankton and Missouri Valley Railway Company through the Yankton Indian reservation, in Dakota.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 2, after the word "reservation," in line 20, to insert the words:

Or, in case they shall have ceased to occupy the same, to the United States: And provided further, That before any such lands shall be taken for the purposes aforesaid the consent of the Indians thereto shall be obtained in a manner satisfactory to the President of the United States.

So as to make the proviso read:

Provided further, That no part of the lands herein authorized to be taken shall be leased or sold by the company, its successors, or assigns, and they shall not be used except in such manner and for such purposes only as shall be necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said railroad, telegraph, and telephone lines; and when any portion thereof shall cease to be so used such portion shall revert to the Indians of said reservation, or, in case they shall have ceased to occupy the same, to the United States: And provided further, That before any such lands shall be taken for the purposes aforesaid the consent of the Indians thereto shall be obtained in a manner satisfactory to the President of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, after the word "railway," in line 6, to strike out the following words:

In case of failure to make amicable settlement with any occupant, such compensation shall be determined, "according to the laws of said Territory providing for determining the damage when property is taken for railroad purposes," by the appraisement of three disinterested referees, to be appointed, one (who shall act as chairman) by the President, one by the chiefs of the said Indians, and one by said railroad company, who, before entering upon the duties of their appointment, shall take and subscribe, before a judge or clerk of a court of record in said Territory or United States commissioner, an oath that they will faithfully and impartially discharge the duties of their appointment, which oath, duly certified, shall be returned with their award to and filed with the Secretary of the Interior within sixty days from the completion thereof; and a majority of said referees shall be competent to act in case of the absence of a member, after due notice. And upon the failure of either party to make such appointment within thirty days after the appointment made by the President, the vacancy shall be filled by the judge of the second judicial district of said Territory, upon the application of the other party. The chairman of said board shall appoint the time and place for all hearings, at some place in or convenient to said reservation. Each of said referees shall receive for his services the sum of $4 per day for each day they are engaged in the trial of any case submitted to them under this act, with mileage at 5 cents per mile. Witnesses shall receive the usual fees allowed by the laws of said Territory. Costs, including compensation of the referees, shall be made a part of the award, and be paid by such railroad company. In case the referees can not agree, then any two of them are authorized to make the award. Either party being dissatisfied with the finding of the referees shall have the right, within ninety days after the making of the award and notice of the same, to appeal by original petition to the district court held at Yankton, Dak., which court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the subject-matter of said petition according to the laws of said Territory provided for determining the damage when property is taken for railroad purposes. If upon the hearing of said appeal the judgment of the court shall be for a larger sum than the award of the referees, the costs of said appeal shall be adjudged against the railroad company. If the judgment of the court shall be for the same sum as the award of the referees, then the costs shall be adjudged against the appellant. If the judgment of the court shall be for a smaller sum than the award of the referees, then the costs shall be against the party claiming damages. When proceedings have been commenced in court the railway company shall pay double the amount of the award into court to abide the judgment thereof, and then have the right to enter upon the property sought to be condemned and proceed with the construction of the railroad.

And insert in lieu thereof:

The amount of such compensation to be ascertained and determined in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, and to be subject to his final approval.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 6, in the following words:

SEC. 6. That said company shall cause maps showing the route of its located line through said reservation to be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, and also to be filed in the office of the agent of said Indians; and after the filing of said maps no claim for a subsequent settlement and improvement upon the right of way shown by said maps shall be valid as against said company: Provided, That when a map showing any portion of said railway company's located line is filed as herein provided for, said company shall commence grading said located line within twelve months thereafter, or such location shall be void; and said location shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior before construction of the same shall be begun.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 6. That said company shall cause maps showing the route of its located line through and station grounds upon said Indian reservation to be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, and that said location shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior before any grading or construction on any section or part of said located line shall be begun: Provided, That said railway shall be located, constructed, and operated with a due regard for the rights of the Indians, and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, line 3, after the word "forfeited," to strike out the words "that said railroad company" and insert:

As to that portion not built; and that said railway company shall fence and keep fenced all such portions of its road as may run through any improved lands of the Indians, and also.

So as to read:

SEC. 8. That said railway shall be built through said reservation within four years after the passage of this act, or the rights herein granted shall be forfeited as to that portion not built; and that said railway company shall fence and keep fenced all such portions of its road as may run through any improved lands of the Indians, and also shall construct and maintain continually all road and highway crossings and necessary bridges over said railway wherever said roads and highways do now or may hereafter cross said railway's right of way, or may be by the proper authorities laid out across the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 12. That said railway company shall execute a bond to the United States, to be filed with and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, in the penal sum of $10,000, for the use and benefit of the Indians of said reservation, conditioned for the due payment of any and all damages which may accrue by reason of the killing or maiming of any Indian belonging to said reservation, or of their livestock, in the construction or operation of said railway, or by reason of fires originating thereby; the damages in all cases, in the event of failure by the railway company to effect an amicable settlement with the parties in interest, to be recovered in any court of the Territory of Dakota having jurisdiction of the amount claimed, upon suit or action instituted by the proper United States attorney in the name of the United States: Provided, That all moneys so recovered by the United States attorney under the provisions of this section shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States, to be placed to the credit of the particular Indian or Indians entitled to the same, and to be paid to him or them, or otherwise expended for his or their benefit, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I move an amendment. In section 5, I move to strike out all after the word "graded," in line 8, down to and including the word "provision," in line 23, as follows:

Provided, That if the said Indians, through the United States Indian agent in charge of said Indians on said reservation shall, within four months after the filing of maps of definite location as set forth in section 6 of this act, dissent from the allowances provided for in this section, and shall certify the same to the Secretary of the Interior, then all compensation to be paid under the provisions of this act shall be determined as provided in section 3 for the determination of the compensation to be paid to the individual occupant of lands, with the right of appeal to the courts upon the same terms, conditions, and requirements as therein provided: Provided further, That the amount awarded or adjudged to be paid by said railway company shall be in lieu of the compensation that said Indians would be entitled to receive under the foregoing provision.

There is an error. The committee have provided a different method for determining damages, and this should be stricken out.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT PATERSON, N. J.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill 1978, Order of Business 1177.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. 1978) for the erection of a public building in Paterson, N. J., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 4, after the word "purchase," to insert "or acquire by condemnation proceedings or otherwise;" and in line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "twenty-five;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase, or acquire by condemnation proceedings or otherwise, a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the post-office and other Government offices, at the city of Paterson, N. J. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $125,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section:

SEC. 2. That the sum of $125,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used and expended for the purpose provided in this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, line 5, after the words "required by," to strike out "Congress" and insert "Secretary of War;" in line 6, after the word "act," to insert "or its entire removal;" so as to read:

That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act, so as to prevent or remove all material and substantial obstruction to the navigation of said river by the construction of the said bridge, is hereby expressly reserved; and any alterations or changes that may be required by Secretary of War in the bridge constructed under this act, or its entire removal, shall be made by the corporation owning or controlling the same, at its own expense.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COKE. I hope that bill will not be taken up now. There are gentlemen on this side who desire to say something in opposition to it, and I am one of the number.

Mr. HOAR. If I may have unanimous consent of the Senate, I wish to say that I notified the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] of my desire to call up the bill at this time, but stated that if they wished to debate the bill, as I did not propose to press its consideration at so late an hour in the day, I should desist from the request.

I will then take this opportunity simply to give notice that at the earliest time after to-morrow, after the close of the morning business, when it is in order to make such a motion, I shall move to proceed to the consideration of this bill. I therefore now withdraw the motion.

Mr. COKE. I am entirely willing that the bill should come up at any time when there is opportunity to debate and consider it.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I ask the Senate to take up Calendar No. 1361, Senate bill 2883.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2883) for the relief of S. H. Pearce. It provides for the payment of $80 to S. H. Pearce, of Columbia County, Arkansas, for excess of purchase-money paid by him for certain lands in that county.

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DENTAL SCIENCE.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1311, Senate bill 2941.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2941) to incorporate the National Academy of Dental Science.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think this bill should be amended, and I therefore move to amend in line 8 of section 3, after the word "purpose," by inserting the words:

Upon estimates therefor communicated to Congress by the head of the Department for which said examinations, experiments, and reports have been made.

I think if we are to pass this bill, some officer of the Government should be responsible for the debts for which it initiates appropriations to provide for expenses under it.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the bill go over.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] will not object. The bill has been carefully prepared by eminent men who desire to have an association in the District of Columbia. There can be no possible objection to it, and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] has offered an amendment entirely acceptable to me, changing the phraseology. It is a mere bill incorporating a national academy so that there can be no possibility of any implied obligation on the part of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida what is the meaning of the provision that the Academy of Dental Science shall charge nothing for any service rendered to the Government of the United States?

Mr. CALL. That is a literal copy of the law in regard to the National Academy of Sciences.

Mr. HOAR. Does it mean that they shall cut the eye-teeth of my honorable friend from Iowa gratis? [Laughter.]

Mr. CALL. I do not hear the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. Does it mean that they shall cut the eye-teeth of my honorable friend from Iowa gratis?

Mr. CALL. I do not know that it does, unless Congress shall appropriate money specifically for that object. But there is no objection if any Senator desires to amend that phraseology. It is now the law in regard to the National Academy of Sciences. These gentlemen have for years been desirous of forming an incorporation, a private association in the District of Columbia, to which they could gather such resources as they may have for the promotion of this most valuable art of dentistry, in which very great improvements have been made of late years. I have no kind of interest except to promote their wish in the matter, and any amendment that may be suggested will be agreeable to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, line 8, after the word "purpose" and before the semicolon, it is proposed to insert:

Upon estimates therefor communicated to Congress by the head of the Department for which such examinations, experiments, and reports may be made.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I can hardly suppose that the national association of dentists have approved the precise form of this bill. It seems to me to be drawn without care. I can not imagine that a national association of dentists, which may be very useful to them in their profession, can possibly be called upon to give advice to this Government in any matter concerning teeth.

The trouble with the bill is that while it attempted to charter properly enough a national association—all well enough if Congress goes into that business generally—an association of scientific gentlemen that went to the statute-book and copied literally, I judge, the act establishing the National Academy of Sciences, which does have occasion on many most important questions to render opinions to the Government. I have had occasion to notice that when the reports have been printed from year to year.

I will mention just two of the reports of the National Academy of Sciences for example. There was a question as to whether we could in any way render alcohol used in the arts distinguishable from other alcohol, as by methylating it, and that question, which is a very interesting matter as one of taxation, as one can see in a moment, was submitted to the National Academy of Sciences, and a very valuable report made. Another question was concerning the proper relations of the scientific bureaus or departments of the Government, such as the Naval Observatory and the Coast Survey to the National Government. That was committed to the National Academy of Sciences, and it made a very valuable report. These are only two among the dozen or three or four dozen of such matters upon which that academy has been of use. But that is an institution covering the broad field of science in general, and of the highest science.

Now, however honorable and useful this association of dentists may be, I do not think it necessary in order to give them the conveniences of a national incorporation to copy the other, for I can not imagine the Secretary of the Treasury asking them any question about the filling of teeth, or any other Department of the Government consulting them.

I think the bill ought to have been drafted in such form simply as to give them a convenient charter of incorporation, that they may hold their annual meetings, and if necessary hold real estate enough for a headquarters building, if they choose to do it, etc. The simplest form of incorporation would have answered the purpose.

Mr. CALL. I have no objection, if the Senator from Connecticut wishes to strike out that section of the bill, to its being done.

In reference, however, to the suggestions he makes that the Government can in no proper sense stand in any relation to the practical use of the knowledge and the practice of dentistry, I do not see that he makes his point good. It occurs to me that it may be of very great importance to the Government to know the best methods of dental treatment in reference to its soldiers. I apprehend, if the distinguished Senator had been suffering very much with the defects which this art remedies when he was performing his magnificent military service, he would have found himself disabled, and it might have been very well for the Government to have had the instrumentalities and a knowledge of the best instrumentalities which might have contributed to his relief, as to that of all the other soldiers in the Army and the men in the Navy.

The practical use which these gentlemen suggest this might be to the Government is, I think, quite apparent; and that they are very much concerned so long as they have an army and a navy, and men in them, as to the bodily health of the soldier and his proper relief from ailments of every description.

Be that as it may, there have been great improvements made in this art, improvements which perhaps have contributed as much in this generation and this age to the advancement of mankind and the extension of life and its comfort as in any other. These gentlemen, with an honest desire to promote the interests of this particular and valuable science, sent me this bill, having copied it from the law incorporating the National Academy of Sciences, and they asked me to present it word for word as it is, being the result of their own thought and their own preparation. Without any other interest than an honest wish to aid the advancement of science and knowledge and everything that may promote the interests of mankind, I presented it to the consideration of the Senate, and I have asked for its passage simply to afford them the nucleus of a respectable organization to which they might gather around and contribute their thoughts and their discoveries.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move to strike out the third section of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves to strike out the last section of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator to leave the first three lines in, which simply provide for an annual meeting, which is in all incorporation bills.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have no objection. I move to strike out the rest.

Mr. ALLISON. Strike out all after the word "designated," in the third line.

Mr. HOAR. Let the first two lines and a half be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chief Clerk will read as indicated.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the National Academy of Dental Science shall hold an annual meeting at such place in the United States as may be designated.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move to strike out all after the word "designated."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chief Clerk will read the part proposed to be stricken out.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "designated," in line 3 of section 3, it is proposed to strike out:

And the academy shall, whenever called upon by any Department of the Government, investigate, examine, experiment, and report upon any subject of dental science, the actual expenses of such investigations, examinations, experiments, and reports to be paid only from appropriations which may be made for the purpose; but the academy shall receive no compensation for any services rendered to the Government of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In section 2, line 8, I move to strike out the words "and report the same to Congress."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] is understood as withdrawn.

Mr. ALLISON. That is out now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in.

Mr. ALLISON. The language was stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No action was taken upon the proposed amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] which is now withdrawn.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 8 of section 2, I move to strike out the words "and report the same to Congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MORGAN RAWLS.

Mr. BROWN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 92) for the relief of Morgan Rawls.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay Morgan Rawls, of Georgia, $800 for a dwelling-house taken from the village of Guyton, Ga., in the latter part of the year 1865, by order of the United States officer in command at Savannah, Ga., through mistake for a Confederate building.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN TUSCALOOSA, ALA.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2845) granting to the corporate authorities of the city of Tuscaloosa, in the State of Alabama, all the right, title, and interest of the United States to fractional sections 22 and 15, lying south of the Warrior River, in township 21 and range 10 west.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 5, before the word "Warrior," to insert the word "Black;" so as to read:

That all of the interest or claim of the United States in and to fractional sections 22 and 15, lying south of the Black Warrior River, in township 21 of range 10 west, in the State of Alabama, be, and the same is hereby, relinquished to and vested in the city of Tuscaloosa for the following purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 10, before the words "river margin," to insert "localities known as the;" and in line 12, after the word "absolutely," to strike out the word "forever;" so as to read:

First. The part and parts of said fractional sections constituting the localities known as the "river margin," the "streets of said city," the "pond," and the "common," shall vest in said city absolutely.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 15, after the word "thereof," to insert "who are owners in good faith;" so as to read:

Second. The residue of said fractional sections shall be vested in the said city in trust, for the use of each of the occupants of the lots, or parts of lots thereof, who are owners in good faith, according to the title which is now vested in each; the intent of this act being not to give any right to said occupants except what arises from the relinquishment of the right or claim of the United States thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read:

MILITIA EQUIPMENT.

Mr. MANDERSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2973) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 1661 of the Revised Statutes, making an annual appropriation to provide arms and equipments for the militia."

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 1 of an act of February 12, 1887, entitled "An act to amend section 1661 of the Revised Statutes, making an annual appropriation to provide arms and equipments for the militia;" so as to read as follows:

That the sum of $600,000 is hereby annually appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of providing arms, ordnance stores, quartermaster's stores, and camp equipage for issue to the militia.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska if the language in the law that was passed only a year or two ago which provided that $400,000 should be expended for certain particular items has been changed by this bill?

Mr. MANDERSON. I think not. It is the form of the present law with the exception of the change of the amount. I understand that the bill is in accord with the view of the committee, and that was simply that the amount should be raised from $400,000 to $600,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. I know that was the view of a majority of the committee. I am opposed to the amount fixed by the bill. I only wish to state that I am opposed to the increase proposed.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is the only change made in the present law.

Mr. COCKRELL. It increases the amount from $400,000 to $600,000. Only about two years ago we increased it from $200,000 to $400,000.

Mr. MANDERSON. But the Senator will remember that at that time the very evident desire of the Senate upon a vote taken on that question was to change the amount to the sum fixed in this bill—$600,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that perfectly well; but I think $400,000 is enough. However, I simply desire to place upon record the statement that I am opposed to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN GALLAGHER.

Mr. PASCO. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2690) granting a pension to John Gallagher.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is a large number of pension bills on the Calendar, and it is now past 5 o'clock.

Mr. PASCO. I appeal to the Senator from Missouri to let this bill go through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length, if there be no objection.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. 2690) granting a pension to John Gallagher was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Pensions reported an amendment in line 9, after the word "date," to strike out "when he first made application therefor to the Bureau of Pensions," and insert "of the passage of this act;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John Gallagher, who was a private in Company I, Second Regiment United States Dragoons in the Seminole Indian war of 1856, and that he be allowed a pension from the date of the passage of this act.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 4467) for the erection of a public building at Bar Harbor, in Maine.

The message also announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. 5445) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, agreed to the conference asked by the House, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. ALLISON, Mr. DAWES, and Mr. GORMAN.

The message also announced that the Senate disagreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 42) granting a pension to Lizzie Wright Owen; asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. BLAIR, Mr. DOLPH, and Mr. FAULKNER.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 351) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Zanesville, Ohio;

A bill (S. 2901) granting to the Milwaukee, Lake Shore and Western Railway Company the right of way through the Lac de Flambeau Indian reservation, in the State of Wisconsin; and RELIEF OF SUFFERERS BY THE MISSISSIPPI OVERFLOW.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution making an appropriation to relieve the sufferers by the overflow of the Mississippi River.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, this resolution will be read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Has the Committee on Appropriations jurisdiction of this subject?

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House, there seems to be no committee which has jurisdiction over such a subject.

Mr. MCMILLIN. How does this bill come up?

The SPEAKER. It is simply sent to the desk for reference.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It certainly does not belong to the Committ e on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. To what committee does the gentleman suggest that it be referred?

Mr. MCMILLIN. The Committee on Claims may have jurisdiction——

The SPEAKER. It certainly is not a claim.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The trouble is, I do not like this kind of legislation at all; and if I had understood the proposition I would have been inclined to object to its introduction.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make any motion in regard to the reference of the resolution? The Chair will state that the Committee on Appropriations under the rules would have no jurisdiction over this matter, and could only acquire jurisdiction by a reference from the House, just as any other committee of the House might do. This is not a claim; it is merely a proposition to donate out of the public Treasury a certain amount of money.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let us hear the resolution read.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. On account of the time which this matter threatens to consume, I must object to the introduction of the resolution.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent that the pension appropriation bill, with amendments of the Senate, be printed for the use of the House.

There being no objection, the order for printing was made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This day has been set apart for the consideration of business reported from the Committee on Labor, in such order as may be indicated by the committee. The Chair recognizes the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL].

SALE OF CONVICT-MADE GOODS, ETC.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I call up for present consideration House bill No. 8716.

The title of the bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8716) to protect free labor and the industries in which it is employed from the injurious effects of convict labor by confining the sale of the goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured by convict labor to the State in which they are produced.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, as this is the day designated by the House for the consideration of reports from the Committee on Labor, and as we have four bills to be considered, I desire that the debate on this bill be limited to a reasonable time. I am not aware what gentleman desires to take charge of the time on the opposite side, but I would like to have some agreement on this subject.

Mr. ROGERS. I desire to be heard briefly in opposition to the bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Well, I ask that debate on the bill be limited to an hour and a half, and that the time be divided equally between the two sides.

Mr. ROWELL. I think this is too important and dangerous a bill to be debated under a limitation of that kind.

Mr. BLAND. The bill involves questions of State and Federal relations, and if passed would necessitate a meeting of the Legislature of my State in order to adopt measures in reference to our penitentiary system. In view of the importance of the bill I think no limit ought to be placed on the debate.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. If, instead of placing a limit on the debate, the House will unanimously agree to extend the time for the consideration of our bills until they are disposed of, I am perfectly willing that the debate on this bill be extended until we can hear the abstract views of every constitutional thinker on this floor.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman propose to permit amendments to this bill?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. In deference to requests made by the prison contractors and prison wardens, who are here in large numbers and who desire simply an extension of the time when the bill shall take effect, I am willing to have an amendment accepted fixing a reasonable time in that respect. That is the only request for amendment which we have heard.

Mr. CANNON. Without reference to the prison contractors, but in the interest of labor, I have a very important amendment which I desire to offer; and I will indicate it. As we are going into this business, I do not want convict labor abroad to have its products shipped in here——

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. We have a bill on that subject, reported from our committee, which will be called up; it is the very next bill.

Mr. CANNON. I am afraid it may not be reached.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. It will be reached if the members are disposed to let us have a vote upon it.

Mr. CANNON. Well, it can be done by way of amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Why not put it on as an amendment to this bill?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I want to say that in fixing the time, as suggested by the gentleman from Missouri, this is not an abstract constitutional question by any means in the world. It is a grave and serious matter, and deserves to be seriously considered—as to the power of the House to pass such a bill. And, second, there is a question as to the wisdom of the measure, even if it be constitutional. So in fixing the time these questions should be taken into consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this bill is not in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, but is in the House and subject, of course, to the demand for the previous question at any time the gentleman from Missouri chooses to take the floor for that purpose.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I only made the suggestions in order that in fixing the time it might be somewhat commensurate with the importance of the subject.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I want to state to the House that there are four bills to be called up by the Committee on Labor.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. What are the others?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The one now before the House is the first; the second is to prohibit the importation into this country of the product of convict labor abroad; the third to prohibit enlisted men from coming in competition with civilians; and the fourth is the bill to provide for the payment to the employés of the Government for the overtime due them by the non-enforcement, or rather a violation, of the eight-hour law.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That I believe is the unfinished business.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Now, recognizing the importance of the question I have in charge as chairman of the Committee on Labor, I desire to present to the House the importance of limiting the discussion on these bills so as to get them considered and acted upon without unnecessary delay; and I appeal to the House to give us the time necessary. I ask, therefore, unanimous consent that at 5 o'clock to-day, if the business of this committee is not then completed, a recess be taken until half past 7 for the further consideration of bills reported from that committee.

Mr. BLOUNT. To be in session how long in the evening?
Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Until we get through.
Mr. BLOUNT. That might be all night.
Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Very well; let us fix a limit to it.
Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Say until 11 o'clock.
Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Very well; the session to extend not later than 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the proposition of the gentleman to the House. It is that at 5 o'clock the House shall take a recess until 7.30 this evening, the evening session to be devoted to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Labor, and the session not to extend later than 11 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. ROGERS rose.

Mr. BURROWS. I think the gentleman from Missouri had better fix the time at not later than half past 10, as is the case on the pension nights.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Very well; I will say half past 10.

Mr. ROGERS. I think all this legislation is too important to be disposed of in an empty House, and I object.

Mr. COX. Oh, there will be a full House.

Mr. ROGERS. Such has not been the experience in the past.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I hope the House will recognize that there is no desire on my part to prevent a full and thorough discussion of this question. It is a new proposition, and it is perfectly natural that the attention of the members of the House has not been directed to it, and regard it with some little apprehension. And if an effort is made after a reasonable time for discussion to reach a vote on this bill, I shall appeal to the friends of labor legislation in this House to stand by us and to reach the bills and dispose of them. I am trying to discharge my duty, but am willing to make any concessions in order to have a proper time for the consideration of these important measures.

I ask now unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be limited to two hours. I make that motion.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I think that the first thing in order would be the reading of the bill and the report.

The SPEAKER. That, of course, would be the first thing in order, but the Chair understood the gentleman from Missouri to reach some agreement as to the length of debate.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not care, myself, to interpose any sort of obstructive tactics to the proper consideration of this measure. I am perfectly willing that it should be considered, but believe that the debate ought to run briefly, and as it is in the power of the gentleman from Missouri at any time to close the debate, provided the House sees proper to do so, he can of course exercise his discretion in that direction.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Let me ask if there is any objection to limiting the debate to the time that I have suggested? You know the rule in regard to our speeches and how the time is usually distributed.

Mr. ROGERS. I have no intention or desire to occupy an hour or a half hour. Perhaps I shall not occupy a quarter of an hour; but I desire to express my views touching the constitutionality of this legislation, and I am in perfect candor when I say I regard it as a very grave and important precedent if we undertake to pass such a bill. I do not think such a measure, so widespread in its importance, touching the very organization of the Government itself, ought to be disposed of under the whip and spur. I repeat to the gentleman in all candor that I have no sort of obstructive tactics to offer. I am going to discuss it briefly and upon authority, and then let the House vote upon it.

Mr. BLAND. I have some amendments to offer, and it certainly involves a great question, upon which I would like fifteen or twenty minutes myself.

It cannot be expected, when a bill is brought in relating to a great public question, affecting the rights of the States, that it can be carried through in so short a time. If the chairman of the committee has other bills that he deems of importance and which are not objectionable, let him call them up. This is a bill which affects every State in the Union and especially the State which I have the honor in part to represent.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I think there will be no controversy between my colleague from Missouri and myself. We understand the interests of that State so far as this question is concerned. I understand the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] demands the reading of the bill and the report.

The SPEAKER. The reading of the report is in the nature of debate and can only be called for in the time of the gentleman who has the floor. The reading of the bill is necessary, unless dispensed with.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent that the report be read.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I do not object to that.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection the report will be read. The Clerk will now read the bill and report.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I ask also that the views of the minority be read.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the views of the minority will also be read.

BRIDGES IN NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. CRISP. I rise to present the report of a committee of conference.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 245) authorizing the construction of bridges across the Cape Fear River, Black River, and Northeast River, in the State of North Carolina, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1 and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In line 63 of said amendment, strike out the word "thereof" and insert the words "of the approval of this act;" and the House agree to the same.

CHARLES F. CRISP,
A. R. ANDERSON,
JAMES PHELAN,
Managers on the part of the House.
M. W. RANSOM,
G. G. VEST,
PHILETUS SAWYER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement by the managers on the part of the House was read, as follows:

The conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on Senate bill No. 245, submit the following in explanation of the report thereon:

The Senate recedes from its disagreement to the House amendment, and agrees to the same with a verbal correction.

CHARLES F. CRISP,
A. R. ANDERSON,
JAMES PHELAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONVICT LABOR.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the bill called up for consideration by the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8716) to protect free labor and the industries in which it is employed from the injurious effects of convict labor by confining the sale of the goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured by convict labor to the State in which they are produced.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That every person who knowingly transports, or causes to be delivered for transportation, from the State or Territory in which they are in whole or in part manufactured, any goods, wares, or merchandise, in whole or in part manufactured by convict labor in any penitentiary, prison, reformatory, or other establishment in which convict labor is employed, to or into any other State or Territory, or into the District of Columbia, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court, and such goods, wares, or merchandise shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the several United States district attorneys to prosecute all violations of this act by any person making the complaint under oath, and the same shall be heard before any district or circuit court of the United States or Territorial court holden within the district in which the violation of this act has been committed.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect at the expiration of sixty days from and after its passage.

The report (by Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Labor, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8716) to protect free labor and the industries in which it is employed from the injurious effects of convict labor by confining the sale of the goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured by convict labor to the State in which they are produced, beg leave to submit the following report:

A large number of persons, citizens of the United States, engaged in certain productive industries injuriously affected, as they claim, by the present systems of employment of convict labor prevailing in many of the States, appeared before your committee, including the accredited representatives of the labor organizations of the United States, on behalf of the bill. Statements were made, documents produced, and arguments submitted by them. They were permitted to be heard by counsel in respect to the constitutional questions involved.

Petitions, numerously signed by leading manufacturers of the country, have been presented to Congress and referred to your committee. They pray, among other things, for the passage of the bill under consideration, and assign reasons therefor. The following is a copy of these petitions:

"To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

"Your petitioners most respectfully represent that they are citizens of the United States, engaged in industrial pursuits; that the prevailing system of employment of convict labor in the prisons of the several States operates unjustly and injuriously upon your petitioners and other citizens engaged in like productive industries, by imposing upon them an unjust, unequal, and ruinous competition in the markets of the country with the products of such convict labor; and that they believe no adequate relief can be afforded unless through the intervention of your honorable bodies in their behalf.

"They likewise most respectfully represent that practical experience teaches that such system fails either to reform the convict or to deter the evilly-disposed from the commission of crime; that it tends to degrade free labor, to harm honest workmen, to ruin long-established industries, and to impoverish the deserving citizen without profiting the State.

"Your petitioners submit that it is manifestly unfair and unjust that the State should enter upon an unequal and injurious competition with honest citizens, or unnecessarily employ its prisoners at such labor as lessens the wages and subverts the industrial interests of those engaged in productive occupations. That many of the most influential of the States have officially declared that the evils resulting from the present systems of employment of convict labor are serious and widely distributed and conceded that no general system of regulation or cure can be established by State legislation; and that national legislation and mediation are required to afford adequate relief; and that Congress can alone confine trade within State lines and harmonize conflicting State interests. Your petitioners beg leave to add that this is one of those exigencies of general concern that the framers of the Constitution undoubtedly had in view when they so wisely conferred upon Congress the power 'to regulate commerce among the several States, establish justice, and promote the general welfare.'

"Your petitioners do not believe that the State should support its convicts in idleness, but that their reformation should be the paramount aim of prison discipline, and all mere economic considerations be subordinated thereto; that the State should stimulate them to acquire habits of industry by paying to them at their discharge a reasonable proportion of their earnings, and by teaching them complete trades and not parts of trades, as under present systems; that the number of hours of labor should be lessened and the number of hours devoted to moral instruction increased.

"Your petitioners believe that if the following system of employment of convict labor were generally adopted, the evils of which they complain would be substantially removed, without loss to the State, and with benefit to the convict, to wit, the public-account system alone used; prisoners confined to hand trades or to unskilled labor; the number of industries enlarged, including as few domestic industries as possible; the number of prisoners lessened by establishing reformatories in which shall be confined such as have been convicted of a first offense, not punishable with death, or for life; all public institutions supplied by prison-made goods, and all prison-made goods duly marked as such before offered for sale.

"Nevertheless, until such a uniform system has been established by the several States employing their convicts in skilled labor, your petitioners earnestly insist 'that the interests of honest labor engaged in productive industries imperatively demand the intervention of your honorable bodies in their behalf, and pray that an act be passed prohibiting, under adequate penalties, the sale or offering for sale of any goods, wares, or merchandise, the product in whole or in part of convict labor, outside of the State in which they are manufactured.

"Finally, they pray your honorable bodies to take such action, the premises considered, as may be fitting to secure the joint action of all the States employing their convicts in skilled labor, to the end that such a generni and harmonious system, consistent with the rights of the national and State governments, respectively, may be established, as will protect free labor engaged in productive industries; tend so far as practicable to the reformation of the convict, and 'promote the general welfare.'"

Public meetings have been held in various portions of the country since the introduction of the bill, and resolutions highly commendatory of its purposes passed.

Your committee present, as valuable and instructive, the following extract from the learned and exhaustive report made by the Commissioner of Labor in obedience to the joint resolution of Congress approved August 2, 1886:

"ANNUAL PRODUCTION OF CONVICT-MADE GOODS.

"The State producing the largest amount of convict-made goods is New York, the value there being $6,236,320.98. The next State in rank is Illinois, producing $3,284,267.50 worth of convict-made goods. Indiana comes next with a product of the value of $1,570,901.37, while Ohio stands next in line with a product of the value of $1,368,122.51; then Missouri, $1,342,020.07; then Pennsylvania, $1,317,265.85. Kansas ranks next, with a product worth $1,270,575.77. Tennessee comes after Kansas, with only $1,142,009; then Michigan, $1,087,735.62, and, last of the States producing over a million dollars' worth, New Jersey, $1,019,608.32. Each of the other States and Territories drop below the million-dollar point, Dakota coming at the bottom of the list with a product of $11,577.36." (Page 291.)

It appears from the report of the Commissioner of Labor (pages 300 to 303, both inclusive) that convict labor causes reductions, especially in the great manufacturing States, both in the wages of free labor and in the quantity of goods sold produced by free labor.

The State undoubtedly has many advantages over the citizen when it employs its convicts in the productive industries, whether under the contract or public-account system. It pays no taxes; its machinery and the power to propel it, its business capital, and buildings are supplied at the expense of the whole people. Under the public-account system the courts supply the labor; under the contract system it is sold by the State at substantially a nominal price. Whether it be the warden, ambitious of making profits for the State, or the mercenary contractor, desirous of making the largest possible gains for himself, the temptation is irresistible to drive out of the market all competing industries. The method is simple; goods are offered at less price than honest labor can produce them.

Take, for example, iron goods, stoves, and hollow-ware. Convict labor produces annually of these $2,413,222.60. The contractor pays for his labor in the great States of Illinois, Indiana, Maryland, New York, and Ohio, and in Oregon, on an average, per hour 5.7 cents; while the private producer must pay 26 cents per hour. The result of this disastrous competition is inevitable ruin to the law-abiding citizen; both manufacturer and skilled workman are involved in the same fate—the one left without custom, the other without employment.

Other industries are in like manner injuriously affected, such as boots and shoes, carriages and wagons, furniture, harness and saddlery, marble (dressed) and monuments, coopering, etc. In fact, the mischief seems to involve the citizens of all the great manufacturing States.

In the judgment of your committee the most deplorable of the evils resulting from the present systems of employment of convict labor is its tendency to injure and degrade free labor employed in competing trades. The learned professions are useful, but skilled labor is indispensable to the comfort, yea, the very existence of civilized society. It is the duty of the Government to encourage its youth to acquire trades and to protect them in their use when acquired. The wise Hebrews say "he that brings not up his son to some trade makes him a thief." Our own countryman, Franklin, taught that "he that hath a trade hath an estate for life." The great Solon caused a law to be passed relieving the son from the duty of supporting his father when decrepid with age, if the father had failed to teach his son a trade in his youth.

If the State become a manufacturing corporation its convicts must be taught trades; when released they must find employment, if at all, by the side of the honest workman, and necessarily to the disadvantage of the latter.

If the industry in which the skilled laborer has been employed is destroyed by the unequal competition with convict labor, then both the honest workman and the released convict are without employment. The latter may find employment by the commission of new crimes and a return to his comfortable prison home; the former, in his age, finds his "estate for life" taken from him, and himself left without the means of supporting a family equally helpless.

INABILITY OF THE INDIVIDUAL STATES TO RELIEVE FROM THE DISASTROUS EFFECTS OF CONVICT LABOR.

The following among other States have given expression to their views upon this subject:

MASSACHUSETTS.

The bureau of statistics and labor of Massachusetts, under the authority of a resolution of the Legislature of that State, reported among other things as follows, on convict labor:

"No specific legislation by this State can cure, or change even, this condition of things. The question has too many ramifications to be handled by State legislation. These and kindred questions in the body politic demand national investigation; and this country suffers in this as in other matters from its attempts to harmonize the many conflicting elements resulting from our separate State sovereignties."

NEW JERSEY.

The commission appointed by Governor McClellan by the authority of a resolution adopted by the Legislature of New Jersey in 1878 made many valuable suggestions, among others the following:

"No State, by itself, can protect its industries against convict or other competition. Trade, commerce, and manufactures ignore State lines entirely; and if convicts were employed in manufacturing an article of general use in one State only, the goods thus produced, if better or cheaper than those made by free labor, would very soon find their way to all the other States and compete with their labor in that branch of industry.

"Any distribution of prison labor among the various industries of the country, to be equal, just, and efficient, must be made by the joint action of all the States."

NEW YORK.

In April, 1879, Louis D. Pilsbury, superintendent of State prisons (New York), made a report relative to convict labor, with the following results:

"The only practicable way I know of preventing the so-called 'encroachments of convict labor' is to prohibit its employment. This would accomplish the desired result, but, in my opinion, would furnish little relief to 'honest labor' in the absence of concurrent legislation of like character by other States. Prohibitory legislation by New York alone would result in driving contractors to other States, whence the product of their convict labor could be brought as directly into competition with the labor of this State as if manufactured within our own boundaries."

WISCONSIN.

In the second biennial report of the bureau of labor and industrial statistics of Wisconsin, submitted by the commissioner, Frank A. Flower, in September, 1886, there is found the following suggestions:

"I believe that the present system of contract convict labor is doomed in the Northern States, yet we can not and should not abolish it until we have provided something to take its place. That now is the great problem. Nor can we temporize with it; for criminals we shall have with us forever.

"From a commercial standpoint we have not thirty-eight States—only one State. My own opinion is, therefore, that to abolish prison contracts in Wisconsin while they remain in force in other States will help our manufacturers very little. Our Legislature can not shut out the prison thrashing-machines of Minnesota, the cheap prison wagons of Texas, nor the prison hardware of New York. If Congress can say that no prison product, contract or otherwise, shall be sold outside of the State in which it is made, the whole matter will soon be adjusted. Otherwise I think that the several States should, by commissioners appointed for that purpose, meet and agree upon a plan of action that shall be as nearly uniform as possible as to the time of abandoning contracts at least."

At a meeting held in Chicago, Ill., August 26, 1886, to consider the convict-labor question, the following, among other resolutions, was passed:

"That the executive committee be instructed to inquire into the constitutionality of a law, to be passed by the Congress of the United States, prohibiting the sale of goods, the product of convict labor, outside of the State in which manufactured, and no constitutional objections being found, that they be instructed to obtain the passage of such a law by Congress."

The following States were represented at this meeting: Colorado, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nevada, Nebraska, Pennsylvania, Texas, Wisconsin.

EVILS RESULTING FROM CONVICT LABOR, AS SHOWN BY STATE REPORTS.

Your committee present the following report of a special committee appointed by a resolution of the house of representatives of the State of Ohio, in 1877, to investigate and report upon "the effect of contract convict labor upon the manufacturing interest of the State."

Ohio.—After taking the testimony of many witnesses, and duly considering the questions submitted to it, the committee arrived at the following conclusions:

"The contract system interferes in an undue manner with the honest industry of the State. It has been the cause of crippling the business of many of our manufacturers; it has been the cause of driving many of them out of business; it has been the cause of a large percentage of the reductions which have taken place in the wages of our mechanics; it has been the cause of pauperizing a large portion of our laborers and increasing crime in a corresponding degree; it has been no benefit to the State; as a reformatory agency it has been a complete, total, and miserable failure; it has hardened more criminals than any other cause; it has made total wrecks, morally, of thousands and thousands who would have been reclaimed from the paths of vice and crime under a proper system of prison management, but who now have resigned their fate to a life of hopeless degradation; it has not a single commendable feature; its tendency is pernicious in the extreme.

"In short, it is an insurmountable barrier in the way of the reformation of the unfortunates who are compelled to live and labor under its evil influences; it enables a class of men to get rich out of the crimes committed by others; it leaves upon the fair escutcheon of the State a relic of the very worst form of human slavery; it is the bone of ceaseless contention between the State and its mechanical and industrial interests; it is abhorred by all and respected by none except those, perhaps, who make profit and gain out of it. It should be tolerated no longer, but abolished at once."

California.—Commenting upon the unjust competition with the free labor of the State, resulting from the employment of convict labor in productive industries, the bureau of labor of California, in its first biennial report (1884), says:

"Rather than such unjust competition should be practiced, or that the State should be made the instrument of an injurious opposition to manufacturers and free men engaged in similar businesses on the outside, or that a system should be carried on under State control tending to loss of employment or reduction of wages, the convicts should serve their terms in idleness."

We can not admit that great evils, destructive in their effects and widespread, can exist in defiance of the National Congress, created by the whole people to establish justice and promote the general welfare. The safety and usefulness of the State, the prosperity and happiness of the people, depend upon the just observance of the cardinal political truth expressed in the familiar maxim, "So use your own as not to injure your neighbor;" it applies with equal force to the State and to the citizen.

Your committee believe that free labor engaged in various important productive industries suffers great and serious injury from the unequal and unjust competition to which it is subjected by the prevailing systems of employment of convict labor by many of the States; that individual State legislation is incompetent to furnish adequate relief; that the necessary power is alone vested in Congress; that this power should be exercised to the end that capital invested, business good-will long established, experience and skill acquired by years of industry may be protected, and honest labor engaged in the productive industries involved may not be left without employment.

THE DUTY OF CONGRESS.

Although we are profoundly impressed with the conviction that the autonomy of the State should be preserved so far as possible under our dual form of government, yet nevertheless we feel it to be the duty of the National Legislature to exert to the fullest extent those constitutional powers conferred by the wisdom of the fathers, when they are invoked, as in the present case, by citizens exercising the sacred right of petition, and who furnish convincing proofs that their individual rights are assailed and their property threatened with destruction.

PURPOSE AND SCOPE OF THE BILL.

It is not the purpose of the promoters of the bill to encroach upon the right of any State to employ its convicts in any manner that to it may seem best, nor even to seek to correct the evils resulting from such employment, so far as the State's own citizens are concerned, but to prevent such evils from extending to and involving the citizens of other States.

Yet we do not believe that it was the intent of the framers of the Federal Constitution, nor of the States ratifying it, that any of the States should become great manufacturing corporations, gigantic trusts, so to speak, carrying on productive industries to the destruction of the business of its citizens.

It will be observed that the House at the present session has declared that the National Government shall not give either countenance or aid to convict labor by prohibiting its employment on public buildings and the purchase of convict-made goods for the use of any of the Departments of the General Government. The pending bill is in the same judicious line of legislation.

The right of Congress to prohibit the introduction of foreigners and aliens, under contract or agreement to perform labor, into the United States has not been questioned.

Congress has not hesitated to protect domestic industries, and free labor employed therein, by levying heavy customs duties upon the products of the cheap labor of Europe when imported into this country—a feature of the tariff that commends itself to all.

Congress disregarded State lines when it passed the act prohibiting the transportation of live-stock affected with any contagious disease from one State to another.

Congress wisely arrested the immigration of Chinese by passing restriction acts, because the interests of free labor suffered injuriously therefrom.

Congress protected the farming interests by taxing oleomargarine and its congeners, and subjecting its production and sale to the burdens of the internal-revenue system.

Federal laws vigorously expel foreign paupers and convicts from the Federal Union.

The act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, regulates the charges of interstate common carriers, creates misdemeanors, imposes fines, establishes a commission, and clothes it with semi-judicial powers, speeds causes in the ordinary civil courts, and in numerous other ways displays the measureless powers, express and implied, of the National Legislature.

These several acts derive their validity, as does the bill under consideration, from those clauses in the Constitution, together with the necessary and proper implications therefrom, that confer the power and impose the duty upon Congress to regulate commerce, foreign and interstate, establish justice, and promote the general welfare.

The Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly decided that this power to regulate commerce is exclusively vested in Congress, and that no residuum, however small, resides in the States since the adoption of the Federal Constitution; that the grant of the whole to the General Government is incompatible with a grant to the States of a part; that the supremacy of the laws of Congress, in cases of collision with State laws, is secured in the article which declares that the laws of Congress, passed in pursuance of the powers granted, shall be the supreme law.

It has been judicially declared likewise that the police power of a State and the foreign commercial power of Congress must stand together. It follows from this that the State may prohibit the sale of articles injurious to the welfare of its citizens within its territorial limits, and with stronger reason that Congress may prohibit the introduction of such articles within the State.

It only remains, therefore, on this part of the subject to inquire what is commerce as the term is used in the Constitution. The Supreme Court thus defines it:

"Commerce among the States, as defined by this court, is trade, traffic intercourse, and dealing in articles of commerce between States by its citizens or others, and carried on in more than one State."

The Supreme Court has likewise held, in giving judicial construction to so much of the clause in the Constitution as confers power upon Congress to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes, that—

"Congress, under this constitutional power, may not only prohibit the unlicensed introduction and sale of spirituous liquors in the Indian country, but extend such prohibition to territory in proximity to that occupied by the Indians."

The exclusive and measureless extent of the power of the National Government to control interstate commerce was clearly and sharply defined in a case reaching the Supreme Court by a writ of error to the supreme court of Pennsylvania.

In that case it was held that—

"The statute of a State imposing a tax upon freight taken up within the State and carried out of it, or taken up without the State and brought within it is repugnant to that provision of the Constitution which ordains Congress shall have power to regulate commerce among the several States."

Finally, your committee base the authority of Congress to pass this bill not only upon the right in the National Legislature to regulate commerce between the States, to establish justice, to promote the general welfare, as expressly conferred in the Constitution, but in that fundamental principle upon which all legitimate sovereignty rests, that the welfare of the people is the supreme law.

The petitioners have brought to the notice of Congress the existence of a great evil—widespread, ever-increasing—an evil beyond the control of State legislation; and it is inconceivable that, under these circumstances, Congress is without power to protect American labor and domestic industries; that it is not possible that this is the only wrong without a remedy.

Your committee report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The views of the minority (presented by Mr. PLUMB) were read, as follows:

The undersigned, a member of the Committee on Labor, finding himself unable to agree with the majority of said committee in recommending the passage of the bill (H. R. 8716) entitled "A bill to protect free labor and the industries in which it is employed from the injurious effects of convict labor by confining the goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured by convict labor to the State in which they are produced," begs leave to submit the following minority report:

The undersigned yields in no respect to the majority of said committee in an earnest desire to secure for free labor all the protection and benefits that can be secured for it by legislation or other proper methods; but ill-advised legislation can only prejudice the interests that it seeks to promote.

In a matter so important the committee should have made full and impartial investigation, instead of basing its action, as it seems to have done, upon "petitions, numerously signed by leading manufacturers of the country," many of whom buy of the importers' agents and sell in this country the product of the labor of jails and convict prisons of England.

Such investigation does not appear to have been made. The committee has not availed itself of the opinions and experience of many eminent and disinterested authorities in this country who have for years made a careful study of the relations existing between convict labor and free labor, and who have, for several months past, been engaged in perfecting a system for so adjusting the industries carried on in the prisons of the country that they may offer the least possible competition with free labor, and who will present to the National Prison Association, at its meeting in Boston on the 15th of July next, the result of their labors in the shape of measures to secure uniform legislation in the several States upon this subject.

In considering the proposed bill the question may first properly be asked, Has Congress the power, under the Constitution, to pass such a bill?

It seems a palpable violation of the Constitution. Bearing in mind the familiar principle that the Constitution of the United States is a grant of certain enumerated powers, and that Congress can only exercise such powers as are actually granted by this instrument, we may search in vain for any authority to enact such a law. The power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States" can not be invoked as a warrant for exercising the power here assumed.

This power to regulate commerce "was vested in Congress in order to secure equality and freedom in commercial intercourse against discriminating State legislation" (see 19 Wallace, 584-590). The reverse of this is the avowed object of this bill. It assumes to prohibit, under penalties and forfeitures, the transportation from one State to another of certain articles of merchandise, not for the purpose of regulating commerce, but "to protect free labor and the industries in which it is employed." It institutes an unwarranted, if not odious, discrimination; it prohibits the transportation of goods, wares, or merchandise, however intrinsically useful, simply because they have been manufactured by the State itself, or under State laws and State regulations. A grosser invasion of State authority and State rights can not be conceived. It is a direct attack upon State laws and State institutions. Suppose, in ante bellum times, Congress had prohibited the transportation of cotton and sugar from one State to another because produced by slave labor, what would have been said as to the constitutionality of such an act of Congress?

Again, it is said to be a familiar principle of law that the power to regulate does not imply the power to prohibit; but this bill assumes to absolutely prohibit the transportation from one State to another of a specified class of merchandise. The power to prohibit the transportation of a class of merchandise involves the power to prohibit the transportation of all merchandise, and are gentlemen prepared to say that Congress possesses the power to erect such a Chinese wall as this between the States of this Union?

The majority of the committee embodies in its report a copy of the petition addressed to Congress by certain "leading manufacturers of the country" and assumes as true a statement therein made, to wit:

"That the prevailing system of employment of convict labor in the prisons of the several States operates unjustly and injuriously upon your petitioners and other citizens engaged in like productive industries, by imposing upon them an unjust, unequal, and ruinous competition in the markets of the country with the products of such convict labor."

A statement involving interests so wide-spread and of such public importance should be more concise and definite in its description of the "prevailing system of employment of convict labor" that it opposes, and certainly more specific as to the nature and extent of the competition complained of, especially since reliable data, bearing directly upon the subject, are within easy reach.

That statistics do not justify the complaint of the "leading manufacturers" is found in the concise but comprehensive report for 1886 of the Commissioner of Labor, Carroll D. Wright, who, after tabulating (on page 95) the classes of industries on which convicts are employed, arrives at the definite conclusion (see page 371) that—

"The product of the prisons is but fifty-four one-hundredths of 1 per cent. of the total mechanical product of the country. The whole prison population of those institutions in which productive labor is carried on is but one in a thousand of the population of the country, and those engaged in convict productive labor but one in three hundred of those engaged in free mechanical labor."

In connection with the above statement it may be asserted without fear of successful contradiction, that the unskilled and unwilling convict laborer accomplishes, on the average, not to exceed one-half as much per day as the free laborer in corresponding industries. As to comparative systems of labor under which convicts are employed, the report of the bureau of labor of the State of Missouri embodies a report on the subject, which, coming as it does from a committee composed mainly of gentlemen connected or in sympathy with labor organizations, is entitled to the utmost consideration.

The committee, after thorough investigation of the subject, concludes, as to the different systems of labor upon which convicts are employed, as follows (see page 174 of said report):

"While the committee are convinced that the contract system, taking it all in all, is the best for the State and for all classes of people, so far as financial results are concerned, it is thought best to limit the number of convicts engaged in one line of manufacturing."

It is no purpose of the minority to discuss the various systems of labor, nor is such discussion strictly pertinent to the questions under consideration, but the opinion above quoted is brought forward to indicate the wide and perplexing range of public interests involved, and as a protest against hasty and unwise legislation on so important a subject.

Prison labor is purely a local question, and must vary in its methods with location and climate. It may be furthermore regarded as a police regulation, over which individual States must have sole jurisdiction.

The proposed bill provides that it shall take effect at the expiration of sixty days from and after its passage. Is this not a most remarkable, unreasonable, and unjust proceeding, destroying, as it will if it shall become a law, the business and property of a large number of citizens who, under the provisions of the laws of the different States and under their protection, are engaged in manufacturing, and have contracts reaching many months ahead for the sale of their products, to whom the faith of the States is pledged for the labor necessary for the completion of said contracts? Will it be seriously contended by any member of this House that such sudden and unwarrantable abrogation of said contracts is within the power of Congress or in accordance with the sense of justice which should control its legislation?

As bearing upon the subject-matter of this report, reference to the report of the minister of justice of the Dominion of Canada for 1887 seems pertinent. After alluding to the congress of the National Prison Association, held at Atlanta, Ga., in November, 1886, it states:

"It was also established that convict labor of a remunerative character, employed in the production of articles which must have a market, is an absolute necessity for the maintenance of discipline, and is beneficial to society at large."

Further on in said report the minister, referring to a protest that had been entered against the introduction of mat-making into a Canadian prison, uses language which is applicable to our own country when he says:

"In this connection the competition is with the exporters in England, who supply Canada with the great bulk of the commodity used here, the product of prison looms and the outcome of prison labor."

A well-known writer on penal matters says:

"The increase of crime in the United States in proportion to the population is a demonstration of the failure of existing methods of dealing with it, and must arrest the attention of thoughtful and honest men."

At the close of the year 1886 the prison population of the United States was classified as follows:

Engaged in productive labor	45,277
Engaged in prison duties	15,100
Idle and sick	3,972
Total	64,349

The cost of maintenance was close upon 50 cents per convict per diem, or a total of $11,743,692.50 per annum. To maintain this army in the idleness which the proposed legislation would enforce would, besides its inhumanity, add such a burden to those already borne by the tax-payers of the country that a mere reference to the proposition should cause it to be dismissed as unworthy of the age.

The committee, in its conclusions and deductions, quotes largely, and with deserved approval, from the report of the Commissioner of Labor, yet it has strangely overlooked his strong and emphatic statement that—"Convict labor is of no great account compared with the presence of crime itself, and to avoid the presence of crime its commission must be prevented."

Again, he says:

"The diversity of interests, the diversity of industries as well, interstate commerce, and freedom of trade all demand that no legislation should be had which would in any way interfere with traffic between the States. The suggestion is the result of the earnest endeavor of men to find a solution to the supposed difficulties surrounding convict labor, such difficulties being so many and running in so many directions that various solutions, more or less sound, come to the surface."

The question involves not only systems of labor, but moral and social interests, as well as considerations of a more efficient and statesman-like treatment of the whole subject of crime than has yet prevailed. It is recognized by our most thoughtful and earnest men who study this subject that in any plan for the punishment or repression of crime the element of steady, wisely directed, productive labor must bear a prominent part. Our civilization demands the recognition of the criminal as a man whose natural rights may not be invaded or disregarded by the State, and for whose reformation and rehabilitation patient and persistent effort should be made. Thorough and scientific classification of criminals, setting apart the incorrigible at hard labor requiring little skill, putting the young and first offenders where they shall be taught useful trades and where they shall also be prepared by educational and moral training for returning to society better than when they left it—all these methods are of the greatest importance to the people. In all of them industry must be recognized as not only "the law of competence," but the basis of all genuine reformation. Therefore enforced idleness becomes inhuman, tends to check the repression of crime, and is in the highest degree detrimental to the State.

It seems to the undersigned that such enforced idleness must inevitably be the result in all the prisons of the country of the enactment of the proposed bill, with all its penalties and forfeitures, into a law. While this might bring temporary advantage to the "leading manufacturers of the country," it is not believed that it would result in any substantial benefit to the toiling thousands whose names are invoked to secure its passage. It would throw the industries affected into chaos and involve the people in millions of dollars of expense without securing to the country any equivalent in the way of benefits.

For the foregoing reasons and others of equal force that are not herein enumerated, the undersigned is constrained to differ from the majority of the committee and recommend that the bill do not pass.

RALPH PLUMB.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, this measure reported from the Committee on Labor originated from a visit to this city of manufacturers from New York, Brooklyn, Jersey City, Philadelphia, and other places, who came before our committee to picture to us the ruin, the absolute ruin, that stared them in the face from this character of competition. One industry after another was attacked by this convict-labor system, and in every case that industry was compelled to reduce their prices below even the cost of manufacture or be driven from the market. Industries long established, industries employing thousands of men, found themselves face to face with this state of affairs. Business men who in their interest only recognized that they should have to compete with competitors honorably engaged in like pursuits and the competition from other countries found at home an insidious enemy.

Labor-saving machinery and the subdivision of work into many branches enabled prison contractors to so utilize the labor of convicts that within a very few months they could make of them skilled workmen at specialties in the various industries. Business men employing honest labor, who were paying their workmen $2 and $2.50 a day, found themselves face to face with competitors whose price for labor was 5 cents per hour, or 40 cents per day; they found themselves in many cases face to face with gigantic enterprises, the entire plant being furnished by the State. Immense manufacturing establishments built up out of the taxes of the people, the buildings, machinery, and incidental expenses borne by the people, the contractor in many cases only required to hire the labor, who were placed under his control, like slaves compelled to work, and punished for negligence, spoilt work, and failure to perform an allotted task.

The manufacturers came to us claiming that it could not be just or right that their property should be destroyed through such unfair competition as this; that under our system of laws a man's property should not be taken from him by any such process; that the convicts whose crimes had sent them into penal servitude should not be farmed out; that their labor should not be used, or was not intended to be used for the purpose of wrecking industries and destroying the labor of this country; besides destroying the trades of honest workmen, the encouragement of which has been the pride of every civilized country; the incentive to learn trades taken away by practically degrading the cause of labor through the continual graduation of the felons of the land from the penitentiary to the workshop.

The legislative committee of the labor organizations of this country, which comprise over half a million of organized workmen, appeared before our committee on behalf of the organizations of labor unions of this country to ask of us the passage of this bill. They said that there is no other question before the American people which so nearly and dearly concerned the welfare of every workingman as this. Your tariff question, which for a month has occupied the attention of this House, sinks into insignificance when you realize that you have a cancer at home eating at the heart of every trade in this country.

It is that condition of affairs that you have to meet. Trade after trade falls under the blighting influence of this competition. It extends from State to State. Last year over one-half of the hollow-ware of the United States was produced in prisons and placed upon the market at 30 per cent. less than manufacturers employing honest labor could produce it. Your wagon industry, your harness and saddlery work, carpets, mattings, coopering, chains, and marble work are attacked.

In every branch of industry where by the use of machinery, where by the utilization of convict labor these men can compete, they are engaged in the business, and I have been advised to-day that it has been even proposed to establish a printing establishment in one of the prisons of New York, against which the Typographical Union are now raising their powerful protest. There are but two sources of opposition to this bill. The workingmen of this country ask for it. The honest manufacturers of this country ask for it.

The opponents of the bill comprise only two classes, for one of whom I have the most unbounded respect. I mean gentlemen who seriously question the constitutionality of a measure of this kind, men whose sympathies lead in the direction of aiding labor, but who conservatively fear that this is a step a little in advance of the line. The only other class that have been heard from in opposition to this bill are the prison contractors and the wardens of your penitentiaries, and I need hardly tell any man whose mind is disturbed in regard to the legal aspects of this question that they whose interests are so vitally affected and who certainly have taken counsel believe this bill to be constitutional, or you would not find the city to-day full of these same contractors and prison wardens, and others acting with them, who believe that this bill if passed will stand the test of law, and hence are doing their utmost to defeat it. They certainly fear that the bill is constitutional. The powers conferred upon Congress to regulate commerce and to provide for the general welfare are broad enough when supported by the evidence of a great evil and demanded by the business interests of our country, and by the honest workingmen of our country, and will justify the passage of this bill; they have no doubt but that it will become a law.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. There is no remonstrance against the bill from any other quarter, I believe?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. No, sir; there is no remonstrance against this bill except from that element. I am not referring now to the legal gentlemen who question the constitutionality of it, but when you leave them out you will find that the only other opposition to the bill comes from those who have sympathy for these prison interests—not an unfair sympathy, but the natural sympathy which men feel for their friends and for the enterprises in which they are engaged.

I have told gentlemen representing those interests that I am perfectly willing to accept a reasonable amendment, extending the time for the bill to become operative. One of these prison contractors had the manhood to come to me and admit that it was a dishonorable business; that the use of the labor of thieves to destroy the honest labor of this country was not a legitimate business, but he said: "Give us a little time to get out of it." The question to-day is whether or not this House will pass this bill in response to the demands of the workingmen of this country and in response to the demands of the honest manufacturing interests of this country, and permit the legal questions involved to be determined by the Supreme Court of the United States.

If you refuse to pass this bill you deprive the workingmen and the honest manufacturers of their remedy; you deprive them of an opportunity of arriving at a result upon this question; you refuse them any opportunity for relief. On the other hand, if the bill becomes a law the present contractors and others interested with them have their remedy in an appeal to the courts. You do not deprive them of any right by passing the bill; you simply respect and respond to the will of the people, and place the seal of condemnation on this infamous work. Where in the history of legislation has there been such a demand for any legislation as there has been for this? Introduced hardly two months ago, reported from the Committee on Labor with but one dissenting vote, already over one hundred and fifty members of this House have filed petitions, petition upon petition coming from every section of this country, demanding the passage of the bill.

Mr. GEAR. How many have been filed against it?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. None that I am aware of.

Mr. GEAR. I beg your pardon. I think there are some.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. How many?

Mr. GEAR. I do not know.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I say that over one hundred and fifty members have filed petitions in favor of it.

Mr. GEAR. I do not dispute that at all.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I have received resolutions adopted by a mass meeting of the people of Philadelphia, by mass meetings of the people of New York, of St. Louis, and of other cities. I have here at my desk also the petitions of over 10,000 workmen; also the resolutions of the joint executive board of a body composed of 5,000 workingmen in Scranton, and of 2,000 workingmen in one organization in New York, which I have not yet filed. The petitions already filed comprise, or represent, in my judgment, from 150,000 to 200,000 workingmen, and would, I believe, exceed double that number but for the late date when the petitions were circulated. I have in my possession a mass of evidence of the blighting effects of this villainous competition which I do not deem it necessary to read, as the House concedes the injury done. In regard to the legal question involved, I have freely covered that question in the report which has been made to-day and forms part of the record.

I am confident that each proposition of law presented in the report of the majority of the committee is fully supported by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

In giving judicial construction to the clause of the Constitution conferring the power to regulate commerce among the States the Supreme Court said, the learned John Marshall, Chief-Justice, delivering the opinion:

It is the power to regulate, that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to the utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution. (Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 1).

Justice Story employed the following language in his dissenting opinion in The City of New York vs. Miln (11 Peters, 102):

The power given to Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States has been deemed exclusive from the nature and objects of the power and the necessary implication growing out of its exercise. Full power to regulate a particular subject implies the whole power and leaves no residuum, and a grant of the whole to one is incompatible with a grant to another of a part.

Chief-Justice Taney, in the celebrated license cases (5 Howard, 504), enunciates the same doctrine:

Congress, under its general power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, may prescribe what articles of merchandise shall be admitted and what excluded, and may therefore admit or not, as it shall seem best, the importation of ardent spirits. And inasmuch as the laws of Congress authorize their importation, no State has a right to prohibit their introduction. The supremacy of the laws of Congress in cases of collision with State laws is secured in the article which declares that the laws of Congress passed in pursuance of the powers granted shall be supreme law.

If we substitute "among the States" for the words "with foreign nations," both sets of words being found in the same clause, the principles of this decision would be perfectly applicable to the questions now under discussion.

That this power of Congress, absolute and exclusive in its nature, is not, in the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, controlled by State lines is evident from the following decisions under that part of the same clause of the Constitution relating to commerce with the Indian tribes.

In United States against Holliday (3 Wallace, 407) it was held that—

The circuit courts of the United States have jurisdiction of the selling of ardent spirits to an Indian under the act of February 12, 1862.

By that act Congress made it penal to sell spirituous liquors to an Indian under the charge of an Indian agent, although it was sold outside of any Indian reservation and within the limits of a State. The act is constitutional under the power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes.

And in United States vs. Forty-three gallons of whisky, etc. (93 United States, 188), it was likewise held that—

Congress, under its constitutional power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes, may not only prohibit the unlicensed introduction and sale of spirituous liquors in the Indian country, but extend such prohibition to territory in proximity to that occupied by the Indians.

The power of the State over its internal commerce and the supreme control of the United States over interstate commerce are clearly defined by the Supreme Court of the United States in State freight-tax case (15 Wallace, 232). In that case, reaching the United States Supreme Court on writ of error to the supreme court of Pennsylvania, it was held that—

The statute of a State imposing a tax upon freight taken up within the State and carried out of it, or taken up without a State and brought within it, is repugnant to that provision of the Constitution which ordains Congress shall have power to regulate commerce among the several States.

In fact, the whole line of decisions pronounced by the Supreme Court, from Gibbons against Ogden, February term, 1824, to Bowman against the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad Company, decided at the present term, are thoroughly consistent, and authorize us to declare the law to be that the power to regulate commerce among the several States is wholly vested in the Federal Congress; that no fraction of this power, however small, remains in any State; and that in the exercise of this power Congress is not restricted by State lines. And upon being advised that a mischief exists injuriously affecting any considerable number of citizens, it is not only the privilege but the duty of Congress to intervene and correct the mischief by appropriate legislation.

In the report from the committee the members will find that every feature of this question has been carefully considered in the hope that every reasonable objection would be met and speedy action had upon the bill.

In the name of honesty to the enterprising manufacturers of our country, in the name of justice to the honest labor of this country, I appeal to every friend of labor to stand by this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. WARNER. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he can tell us how many convicts there are in the penitentiaries of the different States.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I presume there are several hundred thousand.

Mr. GEAR. Fifty-eight thousand.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. About sixty-five thousand in the penitentiaries; but in the reformatories and the other institutions to which prisoners are sent there are a great many more; I do not know the exact number, but it comprises several hundred thousand.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. Speaker, this bill, I have no doubt, has been honestly brought forward in the interest of labor. As a measure in that direction, and so far as it is possible in this way to conserve the interests of labor, the bill is entitled to my hearty support. I yield to no man on this floor or elsewhere in heartfelt devotion to the interests of the laboring men of the United States, and anything which can be done in their behalf will find in me a most earnest coadjutor.

But, sir, I consider this bill as a very extraordinary measure. What does it propose? It proposes to punish as criminals those who transport particular articles of merchandise from one State of this Union to another. Not those who make the goods, but those who transport the goods which are manufactured in a certain way, are to be made criminals and to be subjected to fine and imprisonment. It strikes me that this is a very extraordinary proposition, and nothing short of the most extraordinary circumstances would justify the passage of the bill as it now stands.

What are the circumstances? It has been stated very eloquently by the chairman of the committee [Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri] that labor comes here and asks to be protected. Sir, it is not merely labor that comes here, permit me to say, but it is the manufacturer who comes here; and if the manufacturer had not come in advance with this measure there would never have been a petition sent to this House on the subject. It is, then, a question with reference to the manufacturers. I have not the same degree of interest in the manufacturer that I have in the laborer; and I undertake to say that there is not an honest laborer in this broad land who would not be willing that the right thing should be done in order to give proper consideration to those who are to be affected by the passage of this bill.

What does the bill propose? It proposes to interdict absolutely from passage across a State line every article manufactured in whole or in part by any convict or any person confined in any of the reformatories of the land. We have reform schools in which boys and girls are employed, and we have prisons, the occupants of which are engaged in useful occupations; and under the operation of this bill anything which these persons may make becomes tainted, and on that account can not pass a State line. Sir, this bill proposes not only to correct the evil complained of in reference to labor, but it asks that Congress, by national legislation, shall step in and do that which is required to be done by the States and by those intrusted with the care of convicts, in order to properly conduct the prison reformatories of the whole country.

I had supposed, Mr. Chairman, that this duty belonged to the various States. I had supposed that these institutions were under the control of officers who had been selected on account of their ability, their humanity, their disposition to contrive means by which the great object of imprisonment, the reformation of the prisoner, could be secured. If we lived in the dark ages, if we had no consideration for men who have committed crime, but at once cast them outside of the pale of humanity upon conviction of any offense, this bill would be an appropriate measure. But, sir, we live in no such age. We live in an age when "A man's a man for a' that;" and though he may have been overtaken in the commission of a crime, still, whether inside or outside the walls of a penitentiary, he has a claim upon us which, as friends of humanity, we recognize, and it is our duty in every possible way to promote his welfare.

Now, it is the testimony of all who have had charge of prisons that in no way can we discharge our duty to the unfortunate prisoner unless we occupy him in productive industry. It will not do to put him upon the treadmill or to shut him up in solitary confinement; he must be occupied, he must have work, and that work must be productive—work which employs the mind and the hand, and makes him conscious that he is doing something, and that he is engaged in honest labor, and thus far discharging his obligation to the State.

The work of reforming prisoners has engaged the attention of many of the ablest men in the country for many years, and in conjunction with the States in which they operate, and acting in harmony with the great idea which has properly taken possession of the public mind, namely, that everything possible should be done in order to protect productive labor, these men have been contriving methods by which the labor of convicts should be so utilized as in the least possible degree to affect the price of labor outside. This sentiment has prevailed to such an extent in several of the States of the Union that they have taken steps to get rid of contract labor. The States in which such action has been adopted are Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Ohio, and Illinois. The latter State, which I have in part the honor to represent, has by constitutional amendment provided that as soon as the present contracts have terminated there shall be no more contract labor in our penitentiaries. And it is well known that it is the object, and the sincere object, of those who have prison reform in their charge to so manage that in these various States the kind of convict employment even on State account shall be that which shall least affect labor outside of their respective prisons.

Now, sir, I submit that it is not proper for the Congress of the United States to undertake the work of prison reform. The language of this report goes on to state that the course pursued has been a failure in regard to prison reform. Has it come to this? Is it proper work for us to do to enter these States and their prisons, and decide here by law what shall and what shall not be done in reference to prison management.

I shall be very much surprised, Mr. Speaker, if a vote of this House shall determine such to be the legitimate work of this body. But a word more in reference to that feature of the question which refers to interfering with commerce between the States.

I have looked upon our great galaxy of States with supreme delight, recognizing the fact that there was nothing in the shape of an interdiction upon the States possible that could hamper or prevent in any manner the freest interchange between the States and the Territories of the nation. I had supposed that that was one of the chief glories of our system, that while we had the right to bar out other governments of the world and to interdict trade from distant nations, except on such conditions as we saw proper to prescribe, and had thus placed restrictions upon the commerce of the outside world; yet amongst the States themselves there was the freest trade, and as far as I know no law has ever undertaken where the article traded in is unobjectionable to interfere with the perfect freedom of exchanges between the States of this Union. I believe, sir, this is the first time since the formation of this Government that such a thing has been attempted, and it must be justified upon strong grounds of necessity before the Congress of the United States can enter upon such a course.

The effect of this proposition will be the contamination of the articles produced by the labor of all of these convicts. The girl who is employed in the reformatory for the time being for any light offense, in doing what is suited to woman's capacity, in kitting goods or such work, will so contaminate the work that she does that it may not be sold outside of the State where it is produced. It has got to be sold inside of the State where the reformatory is. So also with the boy; he can not be employed to make articles to ship to outside territory; they must all be sold inside of the State. The effect would be that the competition would come as certainly on outside labor as it would if transported to any other market, and, besides this, State regulations with reference to it would necessarily be changed, and that labor so essential in all of its necessary conditions, recognized now as so necessary that it is even being introduced into the common schools and acknowledged by all to be indispensable in promoting prison reform itself, must be abandoned and the work must be suspended.

I might enlarge upon these objections to the bill. I might offer other reasons which occur to me, but I am aware that other members desire to speak, and in conclusion will say that I am unwilling to give my sanction and consent by any vote of mine to the passage of such a bill, as much as I desire to benefit the laboring man. I can not get my own consent to step upon such dangerous ground and at the same time interfere with work which will better promote the efficiency of prison discipline and prison reform than any legislation we can adopt.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Before the gentleman sits down let me ask him a question. You represent in your district the Joliet penitentiary?

Mr. PLUMB. It is in my district.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Yes, sir; so I understand. Now the bill which recently passed the House to prohibit the purchase or use of the products of convict labor for the use of any department of the Government or on public buildings—I believe you advised me that you had a letter from the warden of the penitentiary in opposition to that.

Mr. PLUMB. What of it?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. You were opposed to that?

Mr. PLUMB. I did not oppose that bill by my vote.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. But you gave me the impression that you were opposed to it.

Mr. PLUMB. I did not oppose it by my vote.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Your penitentiary has done more harm to the trades of this country than any other in it.

Mr. PLUMB. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. PLUMB. Before that I send to the desk and ask to have read an amendment which I shall offer at the proper time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 3 by adding:

"Except as to goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured under existing contracts that have been made by any State for the employment of its convict labor; and in such cases this act shall take effect immediately upon the expiration of such contract."

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. That is read for information I suppose?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Amendments are now in order and may be considered. But the gentleman from Illinois has an hour in which to debate the bill and pending amendments to it, but may yield any portion to other gentlemen, at which time the gentleman from Missouri may occupy the remainder of his hour, during which time it will be in order for him to demand a vote upon any amendment under the previous question.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Has the time been limited? I was not aware of any limitation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has not been. No limit has been placed upon the debate. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor and is entitled to one hour.

Mr. HOUK. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. At what time are amendments in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. At any time when the gentleman gets the floor. The gentleman from Illinois now has the floor, and yields a portion of his time to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HOUK. That will not cut off amendments hereafter?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill is not in Committee of the Whole; it is in the House, and it is in order of course to move the previous question at any time, which would cut off all amendments.

[Mr. ROGERS withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, during the remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] I asked him to yield to me a moment, but he declined to do so; and I am now compelled to call his attention to the fact that he erred in stating that the clause of the Constitution now under consideration was in issue before the Supreme Court in the case which he cited from 15 Peters. I have here a statement of the decision in the case of Groves and others vs. Slaughter, 15 Peters, 449, which shows that the Supreme Court of the United States in that case held merely that the prohibition in the constitution of the State of Mississippi adopted October 26, 1832, against the introduction of slaves into that State as merchandise or for sale after the 1st day of May, 1833, was inoperative without appropriate legislation by the Legislature of that State to give effect to the constitutional prohibition, there being no penalties or restrictions in the constitution for the due and effectual operation of the prohibition.

The case reached the Supreme Court of the United States on writ of error from the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Louisiana. Suits had been brought upon two promissory notes given in part payment for the price of certain slaves purchased from Robert Slaughter, which slaves were introduced into the State of Mississippi after the 1st day of May, 1833. The authority to "prevent slaves from being brought into the State of Mississippi as merchandise" was secured to that State in the first constitution of Mississippi, approved by Congress and the President of the United States December 10, 1817. The sole question presented to the court was whether the failure of the Legislature of Mississippi to pass laws to carry into effect the constitutional prohibition rendered the latter inoperative. All the rest of the opinions of the justices of the Supreme Court were mere reasoning—obiter dictum, as the gentleman from Maryland has suggested—which was not binding and did not become the law of the land. The decision had no binding authority beyond or outside of the simple question already stated.

It is to be noticed that the decision was by a part of the justices only. Judge Catron did not sit; Justice Barbour had died; Justice McKinley dissented from the opinion as delivered by Justice Thompson, as did also Justice Story. Judge Thompson, not Judge McLean, delivered the opinion of the court from which the gentleman from Arkansas has quoted. Judge McLean simply gave a separate opinion, including the voluntary statement which has been cited and which had nothing on earth do with the case.

It is also to be remembered that the decision was rendered at a time when slavery was potential and its existence dependent upon such a construction of the Federal Constitution; otherwise a Northern or free State could have excluded the cotton, rice, and sugar of the slave States.

Finally, the questions involved in this bill prohibiting a State from flooding a neighboring State with the products of the labor of her convicts belong rather to the courts than the legislature; and Congress by reason of the constitutional question is not relieved from placing the seal of condemnation upon this mischief, so widespread as to affect the general welfare within the meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. RAYNER. What is the paper from which the gentleman has been reading?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. A part of it is the decision of the court; the remainder is my own views.

Mr. RAYNER. Which were your views?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The latter part—the best part. [Laughter.

Mr. HERMANN. I desire the attention of the gentleman from Missouri for a moment. I understand this is a bill introduced in the interest of labor, a bill intended to operate against cheap labor and in the direction of higher wages. Here I am with him for I am a friend of labor. Now, we have a law in force, which operates especially upon the Pacific coast, particularly in the State of California, for the exclusion of cheap Chinese labor, the Chinese having become an important (yet a most unwelcome and ruinous) element in our population. They have encroached upon the field of white labor of American citizens and every department feels the degradation inflicted upon our own people, and the sources of employment which should be theirs. These Chinese have already boot and shoe factories and cigar manufactories, and their products are shipped into other States. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Missouri whether he claims that we have not also the authority under the principle of this bill to enact legislation to restrict the transportation of the products of that class of labor from the boundaries of California into other States.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. If it is convict labor that will be the effect of the bill, as it certainly ought to be.

Mr. HERMANN. Then I ask the gentleman upon what authority he would draw a distinction between that species of cheap labor called "convict labor" and that other class of cheap labor called Chinese labor.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Under what provision of the Constitution do we exclude the Chinese from California? Was it under the "general-welfare" clause?

Mr. HERMANN. I submit that the gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Well, I have come close enough to it. [Laughter.] The same principle is involved of protecting American honest labor, and it was that sentiment which prompted the anti-Chinese legislation.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, it is true, as asserted by the gentleman from Missouri, that I was in error in referring to the opinion of the Supreme Court, in 15 Peters, as having been delivered by Mr. Justice McLean. It was, as the gentleman states, delivered by Judge Thompson. But in those days it was customary for all the judges to file opinions; and I read from the opinion of Justice McLean, supposing at the time that he was the judge who delivered the opinion of the court. The dissenting opinions, as my friend has stated, were delivered by Justices McKinley and Story; the remainder of the court concurred in the opinion.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Am I not also right in holding that the question here involved had nothing to do with the case which was before the court?

Mr. ROGERS. I do not think so.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. That question was in regard to the authority under the State constitution to introduce slaves into Mississippi.

Mr. ROGERS. I think that the question which was discussed in the language I cited was legitimately discussed by the court.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER].

Mr. RAYNER. When I examined this law this morning I had some serious doubts of its constitutionality, but after hearing the learned argument of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] I have no doubt whatever upon the point, but believe it to be entirely constitutional [laughter], and I say that in no spirit of disrespect for the learned argument, but simply because of the fact that the decisions quoted by the gentleman to show the unconstitutionality of the law, so far from doing that, indicate quite the contrary, that we have the constitutional power to pass it.

Now let me say that the opinion of Justice McLean was a running opinion; and while I say it with the greatest respect to one of the judges presiding over that court, his opinions are not so guarded and are not accorded the same share of attention and weight which it would seem they should be entitled to. In the present instance, as I said during the course of the gentleman's argument, it was a mere obiter dictum; it had nothing to do with the point at issue in the case to be decided. It was a sentiment expressed by the judge in rendering an opinion upon the facts there involved. He is the only one of the judges of the Supreme Court that I know of, and there is no decision of the Supreme Court except this that I know of, that draws any distinction whatever between the interdiction of foreign commerce and the regulation or embargo upon interstate commerce. That is the point, in my opinion, that tests and decides the question as to the constitutionality of the measure now before us.

The same clause of the Constitution that gives Congress the right to regulate commerce between the States also gives to Congress the right to regulate commerce with foreign nations. Justice McLean holds that there is a distinction between the right of Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and the right to regulate commerce between the States. With the utmost deference and respect to the learned judge, I say it was only an obiter dictum; that there is no such distinction, and that there is no authority and no decision of the Supreme Court of the United States which says that there is. I repeat, precisely the same clause which gives Congress the right to regulate commerce between the States gives it the right to regulate commerce with foreign nations; and the same construction that applies to a law regulating commerce between the States must apply, and with equal force, to every regulation touching commerce with foreign nations. What, then, is the fact? Why, Mr. Chairman, there is not a month that Congress is in session, or has been within the last few years, that it has not passed laws regulating commerce with foreign nations to the extent of total prohibition.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAYNER. Yes, sir; if I can get a minute or two longer.

Mr. BLAND. Does the gentleman believe that Congress has the power to prevent the importation of tobacco, cigars, whisky or beers, or the products of any one State into another?

Mr. RAYNER. I will come to that in a minute.

Mr. BLAND. Because we had better have all of these questions understood before we undertake to pass such a bill.

Mr. RAYNER. Now, what has Congress done? It passed a law, and I wish I had it here. I have made inquiry among the Judiciary Committee, but they can not refer me to the date; but Congress passed a law, as gentlemen will remember, prohibiting the importation of foreign contract labor.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. That was passed in the Forty-eighth Congress, and was amended in the Forty-ninth.

Mr. RAYNER. Yes, sir, and the Supreme Court of the United States passed upon the validity of that law. They held that the law prohibiting the importation of foreign contract labor is a valid, constitutional exercise on the part of Congress of the power invested in it to regulate commerce with foreign nations. Now if we can tacitly prevent the importation of foreign labor, and if Justice McLean in an obiter dictum in which he is clearly wrong, draws a distinction between the right to regulate commerce with foreign nations and the right to regulate commerce between the States, a difference that does not exist, why, then, have not we the same right to do it between the States as we have between foreign nations, and wherein does the distinction lie?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I would ask general consent that the gentleman be allowed to finish his statement.

Mr. RAYNER. I should like to have about ten minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman proceeding for ten minutes not to be charged to the time of either side in the debate?

Mr. FARQUHAR. Let me ask a question for information: whether the debate not having been limited it is necessary to make any such request as to an extension of time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri took the floor and occupied a portion of his hour, and yielded the floor, reserving the remainder of his time. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PLUMB] was then recognized and occupied a short time and yielded fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS]. After that time had been consumed, a slight extension was allowed by the same gentleman; after which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] yielded five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland of his time, and now desires unanimous consent that the gentleman from Maryland may occupy ten or fifteen minutes longer, not to be charged to his time or to the time of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. OATES. Has any limit been fixed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. None.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Does that contemplate that only two hours are to be allowed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; after the two hours have been occupied the Chair will recognize any other gentleman, unless the previous question shall have been demanded and ordered.

The Chair hears no objection to yielding fifteen minutes further to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. RAYNER. There is another question that Congress has passed upon over and over again here, to prevent the transportation from State to State of cattle affected by contagious diseases.

A MEMBER. But that is a police regulation.

Mr. RAYNER. The courts have passed upon the constitutionality of such a law, and it is not a police regulation. Congress has no right to pass police regulations affecting the States, and there is no power that gives Congress any such rights. Police powers belong to the States themselves; and yet in the passage of this act to which I have referred it was understood to be a distinct right of Congress under the power to regulate commerce between the States. This act prohibited the sending of diseased cattle or infected cattle from one State to another, and was enacted by Congress on the ground of its constitutional right to regulate commerce between the States.

Mr. MCADOO. Besides that, the act required the sanction of the executives of the States.

Mr. RAYNER. Undoubtedly; the right to regulate commerce between the States carries with it the right to prohibit it. I do not think Congress has any right to pass a law that will operate on the State of Massachusetts or the State of New York to the detriment of other States in the Union; but I do think Congress has a right to pass a law which will operate on all the States.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. RAYNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Then, if I understand your argument, if Congress has a right to pass a law saying that the transportation of diseased cattle between the States may be inhibited, therefore Congress has the power and right to say no cattle shall be transported from one State to another.

Mr. RAYNER. No, sir; I do not say that.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Then your argument does not go so far as it would seem to go.

Mr. RAYNER. I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota that this is a diseased product made by different States. It is not a legitimate commerce. It is not within the lines of legitimate commerce. When Congress passes a law preventing the products of prison labor from competing with the products of labor of other States it is passing a law in the interest of commerce and for the benefit of the States against which that production operates.

I do not hold for a moment that Congress has the right to pass an act to prevent a State shipping its rice, its sugar, or its cotton crops to another State or to lay an embargo or to pass a non-intercourse act between the States. But this is another question, and you have to examine it in another light. This is a proposition to enable the legitimate commerce of every State to compete with the legitimate commerce of other States and to prevent the illegitimate commerce of other States, which in effect is not true commerce at all, because it is not produced by the citizens of the State, from coming into unlawful and illegitimate competition with the actual legitimate commerce of the various States.

Mr. CRAIN. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. RAYNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRAIN. You say the right to regulate commerce carries with it the right to prohibit.

Mr. RAYNER. To some extent.

Mr. CRAIN. Do you not know that a good deal of the sugar of this country is manufactured by convict labor?

Mr. RAYNER. What has that to do with it? We are discussing a constitutional question now—whether under the law to regulate commerce between the States Congress has not the right to prevent the transmission of convict-made goods from one State to another.

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. RAYNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER. If it be true that a part of our sugar is manufactured by convict labor, should not that be subject to the same regulation as a pair of boots manufactured by convict labor? Why should there be any distinction?

Mr. RAYNER. The different quality of the products does not affect the constitutionality of the law, whether it relates to sugar, to shoes, to whisky, or anything else.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. RAYNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Does the gentleman call this a diseased product because it is the product of convict labor?

Mr. RAYNER. The word diseased was used in connection with another act of Congress. I say this is not a prohibition of the legitimate commerce of a State. There is a broad line of distinction and demarkation between Congress passing a law to prohibit, for instance, the State of Maryland from sending any of its products into another State, and a law prohibiting all the States from sending a particular kind and quality of goods made by prison labor into any of the States. The distinction is easily discernible.

Mr. MILLIKEN. What I wanted to ask the gentleman was if he thought this was a product that should be prohibited, or against which the honest laborer of the country should be protected because it is the product of convict labor. If he says that is so, I agree with him. And then I want to ask him whether the same rule should not apply to the products of the pauper labor of the Old World that are brought here in competition with the products of our labor.

Mr. RAYNER. Undoubtedly; I am in favor of restricting what the gentleman calls foreign pauper labor, but we will not go into the policy of this just now. Let me give you two decisions, and I will then close this argument. See what the court says.

Mr. CRAIN. What has been suggested by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN] is just what the report says:

> Congress has not hesitated to protect domestic industries and free labor employed therein, by levying heavy customs duties upon the products of the cheap labor of Europe when imported into this country—a feature of the tariff that commends itself to all.

Mr. PAYSON. From what document is the gentleman from Texas reading?

Mr. CRAIN. From the report of a Democratic committee.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I reported that, and I think it is the sentiment of this country.

Mr. RAYNER. Let us see what the Supreme Court say in the last case.

Here is the case that is quoted by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] to sustain his view as to the unconstitutionality of this law. I have not heard a word that he has quoted from any court or any judge which shows that a law of this kind would be unconstitutional except the obiter dictum of Justice McLean in this case, and that was not in reference to a point in the case, and he afterwards modified his opinion. Here is what the court says:

> So far as these regulations made by Congress extend, they certainly are indications of its intention that the transportation of commodities between the States shall be free, except where it is positively restricted by Congress itself or by the States in particular cases by express permission of Congress.

You do not want anything plainer than that, and it is decisive of the whole question. That is the decision of the Supreme Court, and it cites the cases upon which the opinion is based.

The States have no right to do it except in the exercise of their police power, and in the last case that was quoted the same language was used. In these Indian cases here is the very point involved. My friend from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] did not read the whole of these cases. Of course he intended to do so, but he read only portions of them, and what he did read were the obiter dicta of the judges, and when you come to examine the cases you find that they decide exactly the opposite and hold that a law analogous to this is constitutional. It was also contended that the intercourse act was not a regulation of commerce within the meaning of the Constitution; but the court held otherwise, and said:

> It relates to the buying and selling and exchange of commodities, which is the essence of all commerce, and it regulates the intercourse between the citizens of the United States and those tribes, which is another branch of commerce, and a very important one, and this power is in no wise affected by the magnitude of the traffic or the extent of the intercourse.

That was a total interdiction of the selling of liquor to the Indians.

Now, if Congress had the right to prohibit the Indians of the State of Michigan, in which State there was not even an Indian reservation at the time, from buying liquor—if it had that power under the clause of the Constitution which gives it the right to regulate commerce, why has not Congress the power to prohibit the citizens of all the States equally from buying a product made by convict labor?

Mr. CRAIN. That was under an Indian treaty.

Mr. RAYNER. Congress has never passed a regulation except under the commerce clause.

Mr. CRAIN. Had not we a treaty with the Indians?

Mr. RAYNER. There could not be any treaty with the Indians except under the Constitution. The Constitution of the United States is an instrument of enumerated powers, and every law of Congress must be traceable to some provision of the Constitution. All your laws in relation to the Indian tribes, all your treaties with the Indian tribes, all your laws in relation to the importation of foreign contract labor, all your laws in reference to the exclusion of the Chinese, your oleomargarine law which you passed in the last Congress, your law prohibiting the transmission of infectious cattle from one State to another—all your laws must be traced and brought home to some particular provision of the Constitution, and the provision that these laws have been brought home to is the provision giving Congress power to regulate commerce between the States.

Mr. CRAIN. Not at all.

Mr. PAYSON. The oleomargarine law was a revenue bill.

A MEMBER. Yes; it got in under the false pretense of laying a tax.

Mr. RAYNER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] is correct. I remember it now. The Supreme Court placed the oleomargarine decision upon that ground, but upon what ground has it placed the right to pass laws prohibiting the importation of foreign contract labor?

Mr. CRAIN. And the Chinese.

Mr. RAYNER. There is nothing about the Chinese in the Constitution.

Mr. CRAIN. Is there not? Let me read section 9, Article I:

> The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808, but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation, not exceeding $10 for each person.

That, of course, was intended to apply to slaves brought into this country, but not exclusively; the clause in the Constitution which gives power to regulate commerce is held to apply to steam-ships, although they were not in existence at the time the Constitution was framed.

Mr. RAYNER. Well, I say that when Congress passed the law to prohibit the importation of foreign labor under contract, it did it under its power to regulate commerce. The Supreme Court of the United States within the last ten or fifteen years have modified a good many of their strict constructions of the Constitution. In the case of Pensacola against the Telegraph Company and the case of Texas against the Telegraph Company, the Supreme Court held that a telegraphic message was a subject-matter of commerce; that under the right to regulate commerce between the States Congress could pass a law in relation to telegraph messages, and that the transmission of such messages was a subject of interstate commerce. On this question there have been many changes.

In conclusion, let me say that while I will not contend in the presence of either lawyer or layman that under the power to regulate commerce between the States Congress has the right to pass a non-intercourse or embargo act prohibiting a State from transmitting any of its products to another State, we have the right in order to encourage and promote the legitimate commerce of a State to pass such a law operating only upon a particular product, that product being goods made by prison labor and coming directly in conflict with the legitimate commerce of citizens of the States.

Mr. CRAIN. Would not that confine them to the "home market?"

Mr. RAYNER. I am not so much in favor of the "home market" as the gentleman is.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER). The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PLUMB] is now entitled to the floor for fifteen minutes.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not wish to take the floor by permission of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PLUMB], but in my own right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can only recognize the gentleman from Illinois to conclude his hour, unless the gentleman from Missouri desires to conclude now the hour upon which he has entered.

Mr. PAYSON. Has not my colleague [Mr. PLUMB] the right to reserve his time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Strictly speaking no member has the right to reserve any time. The rules regulating debate require that any gentleman entering upon an hour must at that time occupy that hour or resign the floor. But there has grown up a practice permitting gentlemen, after speaking a portion of their time, to reserve the remainder of their hour. If objection had been made in this case the Chair would have sustained the objection. These gentlemen having been permitted to reserve their time without objection, the Chair holds that they may now occupy the residue of their time. If neither of these gentlemen desires to speak, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH].

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The gentleman from Ohio had better speak now in the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I understand the gentleman from Illinois yielded simply to accept the proposition made by the Chair that the gentleman from Ohio be recognized in his own right.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The gentleman from Ohio can not be recognized if I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not desire to take the time of either the gentleman from Missouri or the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If the gentleman from Missouri should now resume the floor, and at the conclusion of his remarks demand the previous question, would not that demand, if sustained by the House, cut out the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I think it would.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would, unless the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PLUMB] should claim the time which he reserved and to which he is entitled.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I am willing that the gentleman from Illinois give his remaining time to the gentleman from Ohio, and that then I occupy the remainder of my time.

Mr. ADAMS. There are several gentlemen who desire to speak against this bill, and they must occupy more than fifteen minutes, or they need not speak at all. It is not necessary to move the previous question at the end of two hours' debate. If the gentleman from Missouri attempts to do it he may succeed; but it will be unfair, and I think unwise.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Our committee has other business that it must look after.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I think I state the sentiment of the House when I say that I believe the House is ready to vote on this bill now, and pass it. At the same time I do not wish to take away from any gentleman the privilege of speaking on the question. I do submit, however, in all fairness, that there ought to be a reasonable limit fixed to the debate, in order that we may reach a vote promptly.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. The gentleman from Missouri says he believes the House is ready to vote. I suggest to him that two learned constitutional lawyers of the House have discussed this question, one claiming that the bill is unconstitutional and the other that it is not. Under these circumstances how are laymen going to vote?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. That very position of affairs should satisfy every member that only the Supreme Court of the United States can finally determine that constitutional question. I want to reach a vote as soon as possible. We have other bills to take up. I am willing that debate be closed in an hour from this time, giving as much time as possible to those gentlemen who have indicated a desire to speak—the gentleman from Illinois, the gentleman from Ohio, and the gentleman from Missouri. It is now ten minutes after 2 o'clock. Would gentlemen be willing to agree that the debate upon the bill and amendments close at half past 3 o'clock?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. So far as I am personally concerned, I would.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. If that can be assented to, I am willing, at the risk of offending some of my friends, to give gentlemen opposed to the bill most of the time. I give notice that at half past 3 o'clock I will call for the previous question on the bill and amendments; and I am willing to give most of the intervening time to gentlemen who oppose the bill.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Before that motion is put I think it but fair to the members that we should understand how this time is to be disposed of, so that the opponents of the bill may know what time is to be allotted to them in the discussion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that this arrangement can only be made by consent of the House.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I am willing to give one hour to the opposition of the one hour and twenty minutes allowed for debate, if that will suit gentlemen.

Mr. PLUMB. That will be entirely satisfactory to me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will submit the question to the House.

Is there objection to limiting the debate to one hour and twenty minutes?

Mr. HOUK. Does that cut off amendments?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will not cut off amendments unless the previous question is ordered, but it will cut off all debate upon amendments.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not think we ought to be limited arbitrarily in that way. This matter had better be fully considered. Gentlemen who are opposed to this bill will probably want more time than that.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Is it not fair to give them an hour of the hour and twenty minutes allowed for debate?

Mr. BLOUNT. From your standpoint ten minutes would no doubt be enough time to occupy in the debate.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I am not disposed to say anything that is ungracious, facetious, unkind, or unfriendly because I want to reach a vote upon this bill. I have indicated my willingness to give all the time that could reasonably have been asked commensurate with the importance of other matters which we want to bring before the House. All of my efforts have failed up to this time. I intend, therefore, at the expiration of the hour, to move the previous question upon the bill and amendments. There is no other alternative.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman propose to allow amendments?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Amendments can be offered, and we will vote upon them.

Mr. CANNON. Very well; I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Now, after stating my intention, I am perfectly willing that the gentleman from Illinois may take the remainder of his time and yield it to the gentleman from Ohio, or anybody else he sees fit.

Mr. BLAND. But other gentlemen desire to discuss this question; I want some time myself.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will take the fifteen minutes allotted and preface what I shall say by merely stating that it is not the first time in the name of labor in this House that the rights of labor have been outraged. This is a most startling proposition.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to send to the desk an amendment?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If it does not come out of my time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I only want to send it to the desk and have it considered as pending. It need not be read.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me also to have an amendment read and have it pending? It does not come out of the time allowed for debate, I understand.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will wait until these several amendments are handed in before proceeding with what I had intended to say.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that though these amendments may now be offered and considered as pending, it is impossible to determine whether they are offered in the order in which they will be voted upon. There may be amendments to amendments, and the Chair will be compelled to first entertain amendments in their proper parliamentary order as applicable to the subject-matter of the bill.

Mr. RYAN. It is understood that no amendments are excluded, and that being so, may they not as well be offered now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has suggested that they may be sent up and be considered as pending.

Mr. CANNON. If the understanding is that the amendments may be offered hereafter, I have no desire to have this read now, but will withhold it for the present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be withdrawn, then, for the present.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Speaker, fifteen minutes every gentleman upon this floor must recognize as being much too short a time in which to discuss the details of such a bill as this, much less the constitutional aspect of the measure that is here presented.

First, who are interested in this measure? The laborers of this country. And who are they? All who with brain or hands contribute to the well-being of the community of which they form a part. There are those who would establish classes in this country. I deny the right of any man on this floor or elsewhere or any set of men to separate the boys of my hearthstone into classes according to the occupation of each or the field of employment to which they may severally be called. Show me the man here not properly in the ranks of labor with hand or brain or both, and I will show you a man who is not fit to be here. There seems to be an impression, Mr. Speaker, that but a very small portion of my countrymen belong to the ranks of labor, and that there are but few whose rights are to be considered in connection with this measure.

The line is to be drawn, it would seem, between those who are employed in one avocation and the citizen employed in another; as if there can in this country be any proper difference in the rights and duties which citizenship secures and imposes between the carpenter and the farmer, the machinist and the lawyer. The good of all is best secured by laboring to promote the good of each. And we all must realize that fact.

Is there any gentleman here willing to concede for a moment that there is a desire nearer his heart than the promotion of the general good of all of our people wherever and however they may be employed? Is there a Representative upon this floor who can get his own consent to legislate with reference to the few regardless of the interest of the many?

We speak of disturbing men in the ranks of labor! A pebble dropped into the ocean disturbs every atom of water in that ocean, and so an injury inflicted upon any one in the ranks of labor affects every portion of the social system, from the highest to the lowest, from the circumference to the center, so intimately connected and interlaced are all our interests.

Sir, the man who intimates that any one on this floor is not devoted to what he believes to be the best interests of labor is either a knave or an unabridged ass. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, by these observations I mean to assert that we are all equally interested in a right disposition of this measure; because, to repeat myself, the well-being of the humblest man in the Republic has to do with the well-being of the mightiest. In other words, as society is constituted in this country, that which unjustly injures a member of society is in a measure detrimental to the whole community of which that member forms a part. So the highest interest of this House is to promote the well-being of all.

Now what does this bill look to? It provides—

That every person who knowingly transports, or causes to be delivered for transportation, from the State or Territory in which they are in whole or in part manufactured, any goods, wares, or merchandise, in whole or in part manufactured by convict labor in any penitentiary, prison, reformatory, or other establishment in which convict labor is employed, to or into any other State or Territory, or into the District of Columbia, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court, and such goods, wares, or merchandise shall be forfeited to the United States.

In the State of Ohio, to illustrate the peculiarity of the operation of this measure, if it should become a law, and to show the crudity of the bill, I call attention to the fact that we have a parole system by which men under sentence of imprisonment who conduct themselves well are permitted to go outside and engage in some useful occupation, still being prisoners and, within the sense of the law, within the prison bounds. These men come clearly within the letter and spirit of this law. If such a prisoner constructs a rake, a hoe, or an ax, or puts a handle into a hatchet, and I take it into another State, I am liable to fine and imprisonment; or if I use a plow he has made to cultivate a row of corn running into an adjacent State there would be the same result. I would be liable to fine and imprisonment.

But it is said, "What we desire to do is to protect the interests of labor." Let us look into the merits of this proposition. I assert that the main backers of this bill are not the laboring men of my country. This is the first time I have known monopolies on the one side to join hands with labor on the other in order to elevate the criminals of my country and make them gentlemen of elegant leisure. Will any man pretend to say that five hundred criminals in prison would produce more than if they were engaged in useful occupations outside of the prison walls? Is their contribution to the great ocean of supply while they are criminals greater than it would be if they were employed outside of the prison walls?

Gentlemen, you desire we should have honest, industrious citizens in order that each one may contribute to support not only himself but those who are dependent upon him. Now I ask in all seriousness is it possible that as workmen these untrained and unskilled criminals can yield more to the source of supply inside than if honestly employed outside of prison walls? The exact truth is the other way.

Is it right or even tolerable, and does the interest of labor require that the wretch who enters my house, with murder in his heart, with dagger in his hand, prepared to commit murder if need be in his endeavor to rob me of my property, when arrested, convicted, and sent to State prison, should be kept there as a gentleman of leisure, while I, having suffered the loss of my property, am to toil on, not only to make good my loss, but to support that robber in idleness? Yet that is just what, in the last analysis, you propose in this bill.

This is said to be in the interest of labor. Yet what will be the effect of it? The widow whose husband has been killed by a burglar, if he escapes the gallows, has to toil not only for her own support, but that she may support in comfortable idleness that criminal whose hands are still wet with the blood of her husband. You seem to be concerned about the criminals of my country. I feel a little anxious about the honest men who bear the burden of supporting them.

Is it possible that, under the Constitution, if one of these men in prison or on the reform farm manufactures a hoe or an ax, of which I become the possessor, that I can be prohibited from taking it into a neighboring State? I insist the constitutional power does not exist to prohibit me from doing so. If so, Congress may also prohibit me from going into that State. The farmers of this country can not be benefited by the passage of this bill. The laborers of this country can not be benefited by its passage. Two classes alone are interested in it; those who desire a monopoly as against the world in some productive effort; the others are the criminals themselves.

I do not deny that my honored friend from Missouri means well by this bill; but I deny that any proper interest of my country can be subserved by its passage.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. What class of labor were you trying to protect when you made your tariff speech the other day?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I was trying, within the limits of the Constitution, to protect the labor of my country against the influence of underpaid laborers abroad. I was not attempting to tax our people to support paupers on the other side, and I also oppose taxing honest labor to support criminals in idleness on this side.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Which do you want to remain idle; the honest workman, with his wife and children, or your felon?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. You would tax the honest workman and his wife to support the felon in idleness. Your trouble in this instance, as in all your fulminations here, is that you assume the facts; assume facts which do not exist.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I assume only what I know. I demand——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. One moment. You have not cited a particle of evidence that any industry has been stricken down. The proposition is flatly absurd. On the contrary, there is not a well-ordered establishment in this country that can not more than compete with prison labor, which is unskilled and untrained.

Mr. BRUMM. You are entirely mistaken in making that statement, friend BUTTERWORTH.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I may be. But beyond that, and if it were not true, I regard it as something very desirable that these men should contribute to the common stock by honest labor at least a portion of that of which they have robbed the community.

Mr. BRUMM. But does not my friend know that the greatest punishment that could be inflicted upon those convicts would be not to permit them to work?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I know that the greatest punishment we could inflict upon honest men is to tax them to support in idleness criminals who have robbed them. I know that. I can not understand how it is that these criminals are found to be so especially dangerous when they get together and work, although if they were industrious citizens working outside and adding double the amount to the general supply, they would not be regarded as dangerous.

Mr. BRUMM. It is not the criminals that are dangerous; it is the speculators in prison labor that are dangerous, and that threw these goods upon the market at prices below what they can be produced for by honest labor. It is the tariff question over again, only that in the one case the protection is against the pauper labor of Europe, and in the other it is against the criminal labor of our own country.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The difference is this: We take our criminals guilty of violating the law and put them in prison and require them to work, as they would have to do if they were honest men, and the product of their labor is sold in the market exactly as it would be if they were honest men working outside. It is complained that these men drive hard bargains. From the complaints that are made one would suppose that there was no limit to the contributions of these convicts to the labor market. How many of them are there that contribute? I read from Mr. Carroll D. Wright, a good authority, who says that the product of the prisons is fifty-four one hundredths of 1 per cent. of the labor products of this country! Now, who was interested in saying as to that fifty-four one hundredths of 1 per cent. of our labor product that it is ruinous to the workingmen of this country? How many are injured by it? Those who pay the taxes receive the benefit of the reduction, if there is any reduction whatever, but that is not likely, because the men bidding in this business pay the last cent they are able to. If I should introduce a machine into Massachusetts which would make forty pairs of shoes where only one pair is made now, you might as well contend that the product of that machine should be kept within the borders of Massachusetts and not allowed to go outside, because otherwise some people would be thrown into idleness. Mr. Speaker, I will permit no one to go before me in utter and thorough devotion to the interests of the producers of this country, whoever and wherever they may be.

I recollect a committee being sent to me at my home to say that they would be compelled to oppose me because I was not friendly to the interests of the people in my district. I said to them, "Gentlemen, who told you? Did some stranger living a thousand miles from here convince you that he was more friendly than I to the best interests of the hearthstones that I represent?" "Well," they said, "we got a pamphlet making that charge because you did not vote as you were directed to do on a certain question." I said, "I owe the control of my vote to a higher power than some gentleman who sits in the gallery or moves about the corridors of the Capitol to command and threaten me-

bers who fail to trample under foot their own judgment and vote as directed. I stand here recognizing my obligation to my God, my country, and my constituency, to do the best for my people that I can, acting up to my highest convictions of right and duty. My boys play upon the same greensward with the sons of my constituents. Our interests are identical." What I desire, Mr. Speaker, is to keep wide open to them all the doors of opportunity; but I serve no honest interest of theirs by voting for this bill as presented. There is a way that seemeth good to a man, but the end thereof is death. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] may have his time extended not to exceed twenty-five minutes.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I again renew the request I made awhile ago for unanimous consent to have a vote taken upon this bill one hour from now, and if that is done I am willing to give forty minutes of the hour to the opponents of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can entertain but one request for unanimous consent at a time.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I shall be obliged to object unless that is done.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to object unless time is given to answer the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH]. I can not permit the statements made by gentlemen who do not understand the bill or its effect to go into the RECORD without being answered.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I wish to take the same position, Mr. Chairman. I can not allow an argument of the character of that made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] to stand on this record uncontradicted.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is all right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How much time does the gentleman from Ohio desire?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That depends upon the time at the disposal of the House. I can close in ten minutes if necessary.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I will reserve my thirty-five minutes, and let the gentleman take the floor and divide his hour up among the opponents of the bill.

Mr. ROGERS. I withdraw my request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas withdraws his request, and if there be no objection the Chair will now recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] in his own right.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will my friend from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH], now that he has an hour under his control, allow me a word?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. My friend says he can not understand why the criminals, by the products which they make after they are incarcerated, should come in competition with the labor of the country more than they did when they were producing before their incarceration.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. They were not producing before their incarceration; they were ravaging upon the world when they ought to have been producing.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. That is just what I wanted to call attention to. Do you mean to say that when these criminals are outside the penitentiary, robbing and cutting throats, they are in competition with the honest laboring men of the country——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Oh, no.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. And there is no difference between their being occupied in that way and their being engaged in the manufacture of products in the making of which they work at one-fourth or one-fifth the rate of wages paid to the ordinary laboring man.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I have too much respect for my friend's ability to suppose he thinks I take any such position.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. That is what I understood the gentleman to hold; and it was my respect for him that induced me to put this question and have the matter explained before he proceeds.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I asked, is the product of their labor inside the penitentiary a more dangerous competitor than if they were engaged in industrial pursuits outside?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. That "if" amounts to nothing, because they are not so engaged before they are prisoners.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. But your mission in life as a good citizen is to induce them to enter the ranks of industry.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, rose.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Wait a moment; I will answer you. The very object of this bill is to reform these criminals and make them, when they are liberated, contribute all they can as honest citizens to the wealth of the community.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. My higher mission is to take care of honest men and not sacrifice them for the scoundrels whom, according to our laws, under certain conditions, we even put out of existence.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I have no doubt that that is my friend's object; but, instead of reaching it he is traveling in exactly the reverse direction. The object of government is to protect and defend its citizens, to open for them the highway to industrial employments, that they may produce as much as possible for themselves and supply the markets of the world. These men have not been in the habit of making such contributions. Now that they are suffering the penalty of crime they do compensate somewhat to the honest men who pay the taxes by contributing their labor as producers, whereas they have been ravagers.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Allow me once more; I will not interrupt again.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. No, I can not.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. You have an hour.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. But you would take all the time away from other gentlemen.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Very well; go on.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I have already answered the gentleman's proposition. In other words, in order to relieve his constituents in Iowa, he insists that they shall all be taxed to support in idleness the criminals confined there.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The widow of a murdered man contributes her proportion of the expense of hanging the murderer; and you can not help it under our system of laws.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I insist that these unkempt scoundrels shall pay their way under as happy influences as can be thrown around them, so that when they are set free they shall enter the walks of life as producers, and not as land pirates.

This bill does not aim at contract labor. So far as that is concerned I am willing to vote to limit the system of contract labor in the States so as to prevent any unjust or unwise competition, but I am not willing that my constituents who labor shall be taxed in order to keep criminals in idleness.

The attempt has been made to utilize the labor of these convicts in the stone-quarries; but the workmen there say, "No; it interferes with us." When the effort is made to employ them in farm labor no objection is made, because men seem not to care for the interest of the farmer. They can pay taxes and toil, and men who engage in crime be supported by them. When they are employed in shoemaking, similar complaint is made. Now, how will you employ these convicts? To say that half of their product within the four walls of a prison is more dangerous than double the amount they would produce as honest men outside is a strange course of reasoning. And yet to that absurdity the reasoning we hear would lead.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Has not the gentleman from Ohio just as much respect for the workingman at his bench as for the professional man?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Undoubtedly.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Would you educate these convicts so as to make lawyers or doctors of them, that they might for a compensation of 40 cents a day furnish legal opinions or medical advice? [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If in that way they can be usefully employed and pay the expenses of their support, I should be perfectly willing that they should study law, or even become divines.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Oh, no; not divines.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I would be willing to risk my chance against them in any professional pursuit; if there are those who fear to do so, I pity them. I am willing they should even be sent to Congress, if there are constituencies of such a character as to require their services. I would not abridge the right of these convicts to be better men, and, above all, I would not abridge their right to become useful to the States whose laws they have broken and whose rights of property they have invaded.

It is said by this system the State comes into competition with private individuals. It does not do anything of the kind beyond this: by it men who are unwilling to work are made to go to work, whether willing or not. It says to them plainly, "You scoundrels, go to work and pay your way, and if at the same time you can be taught to do some work by which you can earn your living when you get out all the better."

Now, so far as the contract system tends to injure the manufacturing industries of any State, or the men employed in them, I am willing, for one, to eliminate everything that may have such a tendency.

Only one word more, Mr. Speaker, and I am done. It is said you ought not to ship the product of these men into other States, because it comes into competition with their manufactures. Strange, indeed, the production of this fraction of 1 per cent. by men who are compelled for once to earn their living is going to destroy the manufactures of any other State. Is not that altogether too limited an idea of what constitutes competition?

That those who keep up their penitentiaries, prisons, and reform-schools should be compelled to keep the inmates of those institutions in idleness, and all in the interest of a few manufactures in other States, it seems to me to be absurd. Of course what we desire is to secure the highest good to the greatest number. We are not legislating for any class, not for a few manufacturers to the injury of the rest of the community, but for the whole community; trying to do what will best subserve the good of all who will be reached by legislation, and who should share alike in blessings and burdens.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has used seven minutes of the hour.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. But I have a whole hour. I have then fifty-three minutes in all remaining.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Then I will yield to my friend from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON] seven minutes of that time.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to make a speech on this subject; but as I am opposed to the passage of this bill, I desire to state the reasons why I oppose it. I recognize the justice of the position taken by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH], who has just taken his seat.

If criminals transgress our laws and are incarcerated therefor, to say that we shall tax industrious, law-abiding people to keep them in idleness seems to me to be an absurdity. On the contrary, I would put them to hard labor, so as to make them feel that the way of the transgressor is hard; and in part, at least, to make up the expense to which they have put the State.

But this bill touches other than criminals. Here are boys, not felons, and yet who are so wild that it is necessary to send them to reformatories. Are we to keep them year after year without learning a trade or some useful employment? To do so would be to fit them to become criminals rather than good citizens. They can not learn any trade or employment without producing something. Shall we destroy the product of their labor or sell it? These are the questions which confront us. Are we to keep them in idleness or not? If we keep them in idleness we do not correct their wildness or viciousness, but again turn them out upon the community worse rather than better. If we compel them to work we must either sell or destroy the product.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does this bill prevent employment by the State of the State convicts?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I will answer that by saying if it is right to make and sell their products in the State it is not wrong to sell them beyond the State; sometimes they can not be sold in the State.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman answer me a question?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I would if I had time gladly yield to the gentleman from New Jersey, but I have only seven minutes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I thought you had more time.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. No, sir; I have only seven minutes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is a constitutional question. There is but one gentleman on this floor who has pretended this is constitutional, or who has made any argument in that direction—the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], for whose opinions I have the greatest respect. He says it is constitutional. Why? I asked him whether Congress could prevent the transportation of our wheat from the State of Minnesota to the city of New York? If we can not do that, can we do this?

He answered that we could not do that, but we can do this, because this is a diseased product. Look at it. The State has the right to make it, as shown by the gentleman from Ohio. Indeed, it is the duty of the State to make it, as we have shown. The property so produced is in every sense the lawful product and property of the State as much as any other property. No distinction can be made. When pressed on this point I understood him to say that Congress may forbid its transportation or sale because it is not produced by citizens. In the State of Minnesota nearly half of our population are not citizens of the United States. They have come to our State and declared their intention to become citizens. But can it be said that we could legally forbid the transportation of their property and thus practically confiscate it? To that extent the logic goes or else it is a fallacy. Though I have had but a few minutes to examine this, I feel sure it is unconstitutional. Mr. Speaker, we are confronted by a question which touches our manhood. Shall we at the suggestion of men who have not fully considered the effect of this law do that which our judgment disapproves of; or shall we follow the dictates of our conscience and judgment? I doubt whether there are five lawyers—or more than one lawyer—in this House who will say that this law would be constitutional.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. You are mistaken.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. They say send it to the Supreme Court of the United States. I have sworn that I would not vote for a law which I believe to be unconstitutional; and I owe something to my manhood.

Mr. KERR. Has it not been said in argument that the Government has the right to exclude articles coming from abroad?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. One gentleman perhaps made the argument that we have the right to exclude articles the product of pauper labor of Europe which might enter into competition with the products of our better paid labor.

I do not, Mr. Speaker, oppose this bill because I am in favor of bringing the products of convict labor into competition with the products of our workshops. This clearly is not the way to remedy any evil of that kind. The passage of this law could not benefit any one.

Mr. KERR. Did not the gentleman assume the power existed to exclude foreign products.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will yield now for fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill on more grounds than the one that it is unconstitutional. I believe we have no constitutional power to pass the bill. If we do pass it, I believe it will be an obstacle to the adoption of such a system of prison labor as the working people of this country are clamoring for. I am opposed to it because it will involve a direct injury to my own State, and for the additional reason that it will inflict a very serious injury on the laboring men in my district and in the district of my colleague who stands before me.

I wish to give an illustration in view of the argument of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], that this is not to be considered as legitimate commerce between the States. He had in mind contract labor. I had in mind not only that, but labor performed on State account, such as is now performed in the southern penitentiary of my own State and in the penitentiary of the State of California. In the southern penitentiary of Illinois the contract system has been abandoned. We have adopted a constitutional amendment by which that system will come to an end throughout Illinois in a year or two. In the northern penitentiary some contracts are now outstanding, but they will all be terminated in a year or two. In the southern penitentiary that system has been abandoned altogether.

They are trying an experiment to find how convicts can be employed without coming into competition with the free labor of Illinois. At the present time convicts are engaged in the manufacture of brick. Now, let me suppose a case. Suppose throughout the river counties in the State of Arkansas brick can not be profitably made; I do not know whether that is the fact or not, but I merely take it as an illustration. Suppose by an agreement between the State of Arkansas and the State of Illinois these brick made on State account directly by the State of Illinois shall be transported along the river and accepted by the State of Arkansas; suppose that system is adopted without injury to the laboring men of those two States. Now, is it possible under the provision of the Constitution, which provides Congress may regulate commerce between the States, Congress can prohibit the transportation from the State of Illinois to the State of Arkansas of the goods directly made under the authority of the State of Illinois and accepted by the authority of the State of Arkansas?

I say that in view of the somewhat extraordinary argument of the gentleman from Maryland, that this sort of commerce can not be considered as commerce at all.

But let me give another illustration. The State of California has also abandoned the contract system, and it has by experiment found a sort of industry in which the convicts of the State can be employed without coming in competition with the free labor of the State. They are employed in the manufacture of jute bags for the use of the farmers of that State.

When I heard of that it occurred to me that these bags, made under the direct authority of the laws of California, might be acceptable and useful to the people of Oregon, and that it might be that in the State of Oregon there would be no manufacture of jute bags and there might be no competition with their free labor caused by the importation of the bags into that State. If that were the fact, can it be that the United States, by the constitutional provision to which we have been referred here, prohibit the transportation from California to Oregon of goods made by the State of California, the manufacture of which is acceptable to the laboring men of that State, and also to the labor organizations of the State of Oregon? And when I came here this morning I went to Mr. MORROW, of California, and found out how it was. I asked the question, whether it was true that the statement as there made was correct. It happened singularly enough that he had just received a letter from the governor of the State, which I ask to have read from the Clerk's desk in this connection.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
Sacramento, May 3, 1888.

DEAR SIR: I am informed that the House Committee on Labor intend to report favorably on bill 8716, introduced by O'NEILL, of Missouri, providing for the restriction of goods made in whole or in part by convict labor, to the State in which they are produced. I understand also that it makes it a crime to transport or offer them for transportation to any other State or Territory. We are much interested here in the manufacture of jute bags, and so successfully is the work being prosecuted that ere long we will be in a position to supply the farmers in Oregon and Nevada as well as other neighborhoods with that commodity.

It does not compete with white labor in the slightest, and hence it would work a great hardship on our interest here should the provisions of the bill be applied to California. Will you please give this your attention, and should the measure become a law, see if it would not be possible to exempt California from the force of its exactions? We are just now succeeding in putting our prison upon such a basis, so far as work is concerned, as to make them self-sustaining, without coming in competition with white labor, at the same time relieving white labor, as far as possible, from the burden of taxation in the support of convicts.

Yours truly,

R. W. WATERMAN, Governor.

Hon. W. W. MORROW, Washington, D. C.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, I have been reminded by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEWART] that a large quantity of the Georgia prison-made brick is sold in Florida; and I rather suspect there is not a large manufacturing industry of brick in Florida, owing to the nature of the soil. I think, therefore, that the transportation from State to State in this respect benefits the laborers of Georgia and Florida alike.

There is still a further illustration to which I may call the attention of the House—to a large manufacture of saddle-trees, the largest in the world, which is carried on in the Missouri penitentiary. I understand that not more than 5 per cent. of these are sold within the State, while a very large percentage of them are sent into Mexico. This bill would prevent or prohibit the exportation of these goods to any foreign country from the State of Missouri, for of course they can not transport the saddle-trees from Missouri to Mexico without transporting them through or into another State, if I understand anything about geography. And I can not believe that the manufacture and transportation through another State of such products can injure the laboring men of Missouri, and if it has any bad effect upon the laboring men of the Republic of Mexico we may trust, I presume, to our Committee on Foreign Affairs to investigate the matter and produce some bill which will affect satisfactorily the rights of all concerned.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. You spoke of the people of Oregon having these jute bags from California.

Mr. ADAMS. Yes, only by way of illustration. I know nothing of it personally.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. That being the case, does that not interfere with the free labor employed in this branch of manufacturing?

Mr. ADAMS. Undoubtedly it comes in competition.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. That is the entire question.

Mr. PLUMB. But the bags that go to California come from abroad, and are manufactured in foreign prisons largely.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. Not all of them. They are manufactured East to a considerable extent.

Mr. ADAMS. I was assuming that there were large manufactories of jute bags in the Western States, or in the Eastern States, to supply Oregon; but the fact is that a large number, I am told, are brought in from foreign countries.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I can tell the gentleman that they are made in large quantities in my own district.

Mr. ADAMS. I have supposed, Mr. Speaker, the case of two States making a mutual agreement in regard to the transportation from one State to another and to the benefit to the laboring men of those two States. So we may suppose that at some time in the future experiments that are being made in many of the States of the Union in reference to some new system to be adopted will result in a system so general that probably all the States will be equally benefited and the laboring men benefited equally by transportation from the place of manufacture to some distant point in some other country or some distant State where competition will be less severe.

This bill will prohibit that. That is why I say I am opposed to it. Not only because I do not believe we have the right to pass it, but because I believe it raises an obstacle in the way of the adoption of some new system towards which enlightened minds in all the States and in all countries are looking, and trying by theory and experiment alike to reach. And, Mr. Speaker, I am confirmed in this impression by the very memorial sent to me in favor of the passage of this bill, and which I shall as in duty bound place in the petition-box for proper reference. I only use it now to illustrate my remarks. I thoroughly agree with some of the premises contained in this printed memorial, which has been circulated I suppose all over the country. But in that connection I desire to quote:

> Your petitioners do not believe that the States should support its convicts in idleness, but that their reformation should be the paramount aim of prison discipline, and all mere economic considerations be subordinated thereto; that the States should stimulate them to acquire habits of industry by paying to them at their discharge a reasonable proportion of their earnings, and by teaching them complete trades and not parts of trades, as under the present system.

The State can not pay them a portion of their earnings if they make none. Remember that this bill does not cover contract labor alone. It covers goods in whole or in part made by convicts; and if, as these memorialists allege, the convicts in our penitentiaries should be permitted to receive part of their earnings, it implies that there should be some system by which productive industrial labor should be used in the production of wealth, and I do not see how this radical bill will lead to the adoption of that system.

The boards of prison commissioners in Massachusetts, New York, and in my own State of Illinois have been studying this question, and the result will be that sometime in the future a better system will be adopted and the passage of this bill will be, I think, a serious obstacle to its adoption.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I yield three minutes more of my time to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ADAMS. I can not, in three minutes, speak of various other points to which I might have adverted. I simply desire to state how this will affect my own State and my own district. I have received a letter, and perhaps other Illinois Congressmen have, from the penitentiary Commissioners of Illinois, at Joliet, stating that if this bill should pass there is not an appropriation sufficient to support those convicts for two months, and that it would be necessary for the governor to call a special meeting of the Legislature. Gentlemen will consider that the bill applies not only to work under existing contracts which I have said would expire within a year or two, but it will also apply to work on State account at the penitentiary in Southern Illinois. I have not time to read that part of the bill.

Mr. HAUGEN. But there is an amendment providing that this shall not apply——

Mr. ADAMS. I am aware that there is an amendment providing that this shall not take effect until the expiration of the existing contracts. I say this bill covers something besides contract labor. It applies to the State labor, and until the Legislature of the State of Illinois shall have had an opportunity of adopting some new system, I do not desire this bill to pass at all.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, in five minutes' time I can only say that it is believed generally by my constituency, and I may say in my State, and I so believe myself, that there has been, and are now, abuses in the employment of convict labor. Up to a short time ago in my State the labor was leased or let by contract, and worked by contractors; and as my colleague has said, that is still true as to one of the penitentiaries in my State.

My State did adopt a constitutional amendment prohibiting the leasing or letting of convict labor by contract, and that is now in force except as to a contract soon to expire. I understand that in some other States the same thing has been done; possibly in New York and Massachusetts. The people believed, and I apprehend the fact is so, that where this labor has been leased it has been at a low rate or at a less rate than production could be had by labor outside the prison and in the usual walks of life, and that has begotten what to my mind is a very just and proper complaint by people who come in competition with it. As I said before, the people of my State believed the system was unjust and adopted the amendment I have referred to.

Now, I think it would be better for my State and other States situated as Illinois is to take care of the convict labor in the respective States and market the product of such labor in the respective States, and that my State shall not be subject to the competition of the product of contract convict labor from other States.

Now it is alleged that this bill is not constitutional. I am not absolutely clear that it is. I am inclined to believe we have the right to legislate. I propose to resolve the doubt in favor of the bill, because we have courts that can construe it and determine whether it is constitutional or not. I think it would be well that the bill should be amended. I wish it could have been discussed and matured, and, without reflecting upon anybody, I wish it had been better prepared. For instance, my colleague [Mr. ADAMS] makes a suggestion as to an amendment which is clearly called for. I apprehend that under the terms of this bill you could not ship these goods from one State through another State to a foreign nation. I think an amendment should be made in line 9, and I will offer it, adding after the word "Columbia" the words "for sale in such State, Territory, or District."

One other thing, Mr. Speaker. I am not willing that this bill should be passed unless with it, on this bill, going along with it and in it, we place a provision which will prohibit the importation of foreign goods that are manufactured in whole or in part by convict labor, because it is a notorious fact that such goods come in by wholesale. I think it would be a poor remedy indeed to enact this legislation without that additional provision, and I shall offer such an amendment. There are other amendments that I have no doubt ought to be made.

I say again, I regret that this bill is to be passed through at railroad speed. I am inclined to think that wise statesmanship would dictate that we should even now provide the necessary time for the full consideration of the bill more carefully; that we should think about it and discuss it and mature it and get it into shape to correct the evil which I believe to exist, and at the same time to stand the scrutiny of the court. For that reason, sir, if the gentleman insists upon demanding the previous question, I shall vote against ordering the previous question unless it can be properly amended, and then I will co-operate, on some other day to be fixed, to the best of my ability with the majority of the members of the House in further consideration of the bill.

I think that is the sensible thing to do. I say again, I favor legislation on this line; but I think we ought to take a little more time to mature the bill and not rush it through here at railroad speed, and then in six months or a year, or two years perhaps, have it declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court, and all this owing to our want of vigilance in properly preparing and maturing the bill.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I yield eight minutes to my colleague [Mr. OUTHWAITE].

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I shall not discuss at all the question of the constitutionality of this bill. I will say, however, that I am firmly convinced in my own mind that it is not constitutional, and therefore I shall be compelled to vote against it. I am not willing that it shall go to the courts to be submitted to them to determine whether it is constitutional or not when I have such profound convictions against its constitutionality. By the time the court could pass upon the constitutional question the evils which I see in the bill would have come to pass, and therefore I prefer that instead of this bill being submitted in some instances to courts which will immediately decide it to be unconstitutional and in other instances to courts which will decide it to be constitutional, thus establishing different systems in different parts of this country—instead of that I prefer now to say by my vote that there shall not be any such result. In addition to the unconstitutionality of the bill the evils that I see in it come from the Congress of the United States interfering in this manner with the domestic affairs of the States.

The States are all busily engaged in trying to solve this difficult problem of how to deal with the labor of their convicts without interfering too much with the labor of citizens outside. Gentlemen have talked a good deal this afternoon about "dishonest" labor as contrasted with honest labor. I wish to remind those gentlemen of the fact that a large percentage of the prisoners in our State prisons are honest men. They got into prison not by reason of dishonesty, but through violations of other provisions of law, by reason of assaults committed in the heat of passion, or by other crimes of a character that do not carry with them any of the peculiar disgrace of dishonesty. In my own State we have been, and still are, laboring with this problem. The State Legislature has adopted several plans, and we have at this time a plan in operation which appears to be working well. We carry out one of the suggestions of this petition; that is to say, we provide that those who labor and who behave themselves generally shall receive certain rewards. When they leave the prison they receive a part of the compensation which they have earned, but in addition to that we have, moving about through the State, working in the workshops in different places, about 700 convicts who are out on parole, out so long as they behave themselves, out so long as they labor, out so long as they conduct themselves like good citizens. Now, this bill would strike at this labor in the factories and workshops where these men are engaged, and it might possibly make such a condition of things that the establishments which now employ them would not feel at liberty to do so any longer because their labor is "convict labor."

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The bill only applies to convict labor employed in any penitentiary, prison, reformatory, or other establishment in which convict labor is employed.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. "Or other establishment in which convict labor is employed."

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Yes; but if they are out on ticket of leave they are not subject to that provision.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. They are; or at least the bill is open to that construction. Now, Mr. Speaker, without undertaking to state the amount of capital invested in this way—because some who seek such legislation as this do not regard the rights of men who have thus invested their capital—I will state that in Columbus, Ohio, there are a million of dollars invested in plants of this nature, by the State and by individuals. All this would have to be changed. The Legislature would have to be called together to make provision on this subject, or the prison remain in a chaotic state for months.

The industries that are carried on within the walls afford employment for quite as large a number of citizens outside. The material which is necessary—the wood and the iron—must be produced and brought to be used inside; all affording employment to those citizens who produce and transport. The hand implements of agriculture are sent out of the State chiefly, but do not come in competition with any manufacturer or laborer anywhere within a range of 50 miles of the prison. Portions of the hardware, of which a great quantity suitable for saddlery is made therein, are sold in Ohio, and used by the makers of saddlery. Its making in the prison does not interfere with any labor within the same range; but under this bill as it now stands any harness in which any such hardware is used can not be taken or transported out of the State without subjecting the person who does so to a criminal prosecution. This would subject the business of the manufacturer of such saddlery to such interference as might deprive many honest citizens of employment.

Mr. Speaker, there are certain amendments to this bill which might make it less hurtful in its immediate effects. I shall assist every effort to perfect the bill, but with my present view of its unconstitutionality I must withhold my vote for its passage unless it is made much better than it now is.

I wish to call attention to this report, which embraces some rather peculiar features. In one portion of the report is stated:

Your petitioners do not believe that the State should support its convicts in idleness, but that their reformation should be the paramount aim of prison discipline and all mere economic considerations be subordinated thereto; that the State should stimulate them to acquire habits of industry by paying to them at their discharge a reasonable proportion of their earnings.

That is what is done in my State.

And by teaching them complete trades—

With the view, as I understand, of bringing these convicts out to compete with honest labor. On another page of the report we have this language:

If the State become a manufacturing corporation, its convicts must be taught trades.

Here the objection is made that the manufacturing interest in the prisons must necessarily teach the convicts trades.

When released they must find employment, if at all, by the side of the honest workman, and necessarily to the disadvantage of the latter.

If we reform a man, make a good citizen of him, train him to be a laborer, does that result in any disadvantage to the rest of his fellowmen? This bill, in one view, proposes to strike down the system of making convicts labor at all.

If the industry in which the skilled laborer has been employed is destroyed by the unequal competition with convict labor, then both the honest workman and the released convict are without employment.

That is very true—it is a truism, but will some one show me an instance in which this has happened?

Something has been said about the number of petitions of workingmen in favor of the passage of this bill. I hold in my hand the only petition of that kind which I have received from my district. There is situated there a city of 90,000 inhabitants, embracing at least 16,000 laborers, underneath the shadow of the walls of a prison; but this long petition is signed by only sixteen persons. There are thousands in that district interested in the cause of labor, and if there had been any general desire that this bill should be passed, so as to put an end to the competition of these convict-made articles, the workingmen there would have manifested their interest in some more emphatic way than by this meagerly signed petition.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I yield a few moments to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am deeply in sympathy with the objects of this bill. I would by every constitutional means protect American free labor from competition with foreign pauper and domestic convict labor.

But my convictions are so clear that this bill contravenes the provisions of the Constitution of the United States and exceeds the limits of our legislative powers that, as much as I deprecate the continuous competition of convict labor, I can not vote for a bill which I believe to be void.

Prisons for the confinement of criminals are a necessity. The State which properly punishes its criminals can properly employ them at labor, and the product of that labor is property of equal dignity and consideration under the Constitution with any other product of man's labor.

If Congress, under its authority to regulate commerce between the States, can prevent all commerce between the States in the product of prison labor, it can prevent all commerce in the product of our farm labor or that of our paid operators in factories.

If the proposition were before us to prevent absolutely the shipment of wheat from one State to another, or of cotton goods from one State to another, I believe we would all agree that we did not have such power of prohibition under the power of regulation of commerce. But if we can prohibit goods manufactured by one establishment from transshipment we can in like manner prohibit goods from all establishments.

I believe that adequate relief can be had through the action of the States, whose Legislatures have undoubted right to direct that their own convict labor should not be permitted to compete with American labor. But if the States fail to protect American workmen, I am confident that it is beyond the power of Congress under its right to regulate commerce to prevent all commerce. So much for the milder provisions of the bill.

But what is to be said of the provisions of forfeiture, which are always obnoxious to the spirit of our laws? What is the United States to do with such property when it is forfeited? Will they sell it in competition with American labor? If they do will the Government give a disinfected title to it, so that a purchaser could ship it home, or is it liable to be reseized and reconfiscated and resold? I believe the bill unconstitutional because it prevents commerce instead of regulating it, and because it takes lawful property from its owner without due process of law.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I presume that almost every gentleman in this House experiences the embarrassment resulting from the circumstances under which we are brought to a consideration of this proposition. From the character of the measure which was pending when the previous time of the Committee on Labor expired we were led to expect that we should be brought to-day to a different question. Scarcely any of us—perhaps none outside of the Committee on Labor—had expected that this measure would come up for consideration.

In urging the bill upon the House gentlemen have been enthused by the fact that there are petitions here from labor organizations; but in spite of all their zeal it appears that in all this great country only 156,000 people have been induced to sign those petitions. More than that, such petitions are discredited by the knowledge we all have as to the methods by which petitions of this character are gotten up.

This movement is further discredited by the fact that the petition, which makes up the great body of the report of the majority, seems to have been gotten up by a lot of manufacturers. It is by such pressure as this that the effort is made to hurry us forward into legislation upon a bill involving questions of the greatest interest—constitutional questions, for instance, affecting the power of the Federal Government under its authority to regulate commerce between the States; the question of the right of Congress to go into the several States and destroy the systems which, under the police powers of those States, have been adopted for the suppression of crime. With such questions as these presented we are asked to take up and, without consultation with the States, pass a measure of this kind.

Not only are these constitutional questions suddenly thrown upon us, but under the direction of the Committee on Labor they are brought into this House to be discussed under allowances of five and ten minutes' time. In this way we are expected to reach a conclusion on grave questions. So far as I am concerned—and I presume such is the experience of every gentleman who has taken the floor—the very suggestion of the character of the questions to be discussed is a negative upon any attempt to discuss them at this time. No gentleman can undertake to discuss propositions of this kind under such limitations; and there is practically an absolute preclusion of debate upon them so far as any satisfactory determination is concerned.

In my own State (which is an illustration of others) there is vice and crime which we have seen fit by law to regulate and punish. In this society has a deep interest. The thief, the burglar, the murderer, all manner of criminals are to be found there as in every community, no matter how high the grade of civilization may be. Like other States, we have been struggling with the question how to prevent crime; how to punish criminals; how they should be occupied while undergoing imprisonment; whether they should be worked inside the walls of a prison, or in the mines, on the farms, or on the public high-ways. And the final conclusion has not been reached until this hour, and it seems, sir, to citizens of my own State that it is not proper, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] has said, that this class of enemies of society, who have forfeited all rights to liberty, to property, all claims to respect, should be excluded from labor, should be charged upon the toil of honest, industrious people. It is abhorrent to the sense of the people of my own State. So I take it it is abhorrent to the people of other States.

What does this bill propose?

In this report gentlemen undertake to discuss the present convict systems and what should be done in reference to them. They are not content with that exercise of police power always regarded as within the province of the States. They undertake to discuss and to report legislation which has for its object the control of the States in that direction.

What does the bill propose? It proposes to protect free labor and the industries in which it is employed from the unjust competition of goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured in any State by convict labor.

It is contended if these convicts required to labor produce wealth in the States, which may be sold there in the limits of the State, or, indeed, outside of the limits of the State, it will result in depreciating the value of the products produced by free labor by being brought into competition with them. Now, if it is asked how we are to do this under the power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States, I wish to say that the power to regulate the commerce between the States, as our fathers understood it and as we understand it, was not intended to destroy the exchange of products, but, on the contrary, was intended to take away from the several States the power which they had claimed of preventing such interchange of commodities between themselves and confer upon Congress the power of regulating the commerce between the States and preserving free exchanges between them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will now yield to my friend from Kentucky [Mr. STONE].

[Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I am satisfied that the House not only regards this bill as raising a constitutional question, but a most important one, and that the bill, if constitutional, needs to be perfected to accomplish the good sought without carrying with it the evils which now infect it, and which need to be removed. I want to illustrate the practical operation of the bill as presented to show the necessity for amendment. Suppose, for instance, a man living on the line between two States has a wagon, a single part of which was manufactured, we will say, in Ohio. By the provisions of this bill he could not drive it across the line to go to his neighbor's mill without being guilty of a crime and becoming liable to imprisonment. I am more than willing to give the bill such time for consideration as its importance entitles it to, but it ought to be perfected, freed of its crudities, and improved so as to do away with the evils now embodied in it, while preserving all the good which it is hoped will result from its adoption. I trust, therefore, the gentleman from Missouri will agree to allow this bill to be recommitted, or else to fix some day certain for its further consideration, and then take up the other bills the committee have in charge and proceed with their consideration. That will give members time to examine this measure.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Will you permit me a moment?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. This is the only day under the rules of the House for the consideration of labor bills.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. True, but the House in its wisdom, no doubt, will see fit to give such time as may be necessary to the honorable gentleman to enable the bill to be perfected; and I think it would be good policy on his part to allow that.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I do not think that we would be able to get a day.

Mr. REED. But if the House should vote to postpone its consideration to a day certain that would give it a preference, would it not?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. If the House will now agree that this bill shall be taken up within a few days, I shall not object.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. My suggestion is that its further consideration be postponed to a day certain.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. But I have no guaranty that we can then get it up.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. So far as I am concerned, and other opponents of the bill, for whom I think I may speak, there will be no obstacle thrown in the way at that time.

Mr. REED. You have a guaranty of the strength of the bill, and also a guaranty of the gentleman from Ohio, who is opposed to the bill, and it gives you as great strength as you can have now, certainly.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. We have given to the enemies—not the enemies, I will not say that, but those opposed to the bill—two hours of solid debate, and there have been but twenty minutes occupied in favor of it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. There has been a lengthy debate allowed.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. And after you gentlemen have made every objection you can urge you now want to postpone its consideration just at the time its advocates are about to give you some good solid reasons why it should pass.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. You are taking my time. My friends on the right and on the left express their appreciation of a great constitutional measure when a bill which changes the entire system in every State in the Union is allowed two hours' consideration. Do gentlemen consider two hours as sufficient to consider and perfect a bill which reaches every part of the Union and is intended to change the management of all penal institutions in every one of the States, beyond the fact that the constitutionality of the measure is more than doubtful?

Mr. REED. But the point that the gentleman from Missouri makes is that you have occupied two hours in opposition, and now you want to postpone the consideration before hearing what is to be said in favor of it. That seems to be a fair objection.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not object to the gentleman occupying such time as he may consider necessary. I only suggest the propriety of continuing the consideration to such time as will enable us to understand thoroughly the merits of the various suggestions presented, thereby perfecting the bill, if such a thing is possible, and eliminating from it the objectionable and evidently bad features, some of which have been pointed out.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr O'NEILL, of Missouri. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield to me a moment to offer an amendment?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I have but thirty-five minutes, and will yield five minutes of that time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. OATES. Before the gentleman proceeds I wish to ask in regard to the time when a vote is to be taken on this bill. I would like some indication as to what course the gentleman is going to pursue.

I do not think myself that sufficient time has been given to the discussion of the bill. I would like the gentleman to agree that after taking his time now he will permit the bill to be postponed to a definite time.

Mr. BRUMM. I suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that perhaps he had better agree to that.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. If we can have an opportunity to consider it at a fixed time I have no objection.

Mr. BLAND. I have been trying all day to be heard. I represent a State which is very much interested in this question, and I want at least fifteen minutes myself.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I will ask unanimous consent that this bill be made the special order for this day week immediately after the reading of the Journal. If that can be done and the House will give us that day, I will cheerfully consent that it may go over.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I hope that will be done, and that the vote shall be taken at an hour to be now fixed.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. After the reading of the Journal on that day that the bill shall be taken up for consideration.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Is that fair? I hope there will be no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will submit the request of the gentleman to the House. Is there objection to assigning next Tuesday for the consideration of this bill?

Mr. WASHINGTON. I object.

Mr. COMPTON. I make the motion that this bill be postponed until the time suggested. I do not understand that it requires unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the gentleman from Missouri is entitled to the floor for debate, and the motion could not be entertained while he occupies the floor.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Then I will modify my request, as I understand the gentlemen expect to consider the tariff bill on that day, and fix next Saturday for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. COMPTON. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Does that require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Not a motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the gentleman from Missouri is entitled to the floor for debate, and is holding the floor for that purpose. He asks that the bill may be postponed until next Saturday. That request requires unanimous consent. It can not now be made a special order to the exclusion of all other business, except by unanimous consent. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman to postpone the bill, and make its consideration a special order on Saturday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not object to the postponement of the consideration of this bill to a time certain; but I object to its being assigned for Saturday, because that day may be assigned for the consideration of an appropriation bill.

Mr. RAYNER. I object to the request in regard to the postponement.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I have made every effort to concede to those who are opposed to this bill everything they have asked. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the Committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 314) authorizing the Secretary of War to place the name of James L. Henderson on the roll of Company B, Sixteenth Kentucky Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. 335) granting a pension to General W. E. Woodruff;

A bill (H. R. 1540) to establish a port of delivery at Grand Rapids, Mich.;

A bill (H. R. 2161) for the relief of Thomas I. Taylor;

A bill (H. R. 6098) authorizing the construction and repair of the roads from the entrance to the reservation of the Presidio at San Francisco, Cal., to the national cemetery on the same, and the fencing and protection of the said reservation and the cemetery thereon; and

A bill (H. R. 8489) granting a pension to Abial G. Chamberlain.

CONVICT CONTRACT LABOR.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Speaker, objections of a double character have been made to this bill. One is that it is going to consign all the convicts of this country to a life of idleness, and the other that it is unconstitutional.

Now, as I understand this movement, and we have had it in our State for some years, the object is not in the least to consign convicts to idleness or to prevent their learning a trade, but simply to do away with the system of leasing them out in masses under contract at prices for their labor which defy competition. They often are leased out by the State in a single body in some single trade.

Last year in Massachusetts we adopted a law which covered these points. It forbade, in the first place, contract labor by convicts. It provided that the warden should have the power to say what trades they should learn, and it provided further that he should sell the product of their labor in open market at current wholesale prices.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. This bill does not touch that question at all.

Mr. LODGE. I have but five minutes and the gentleman has had his hour. All I understand by this bill is that it is to protect those States which have adopted this system against the contract system of convict-made goods in other States. We are told that this is an infringement of the rights of States. Now, no one questions that it is the right of a State to settle its own prison system; but a State which chooses to try this new system and prevent the leasing of convicts has its system nullified by other States. The whole drift of constitutional decision and of constitutional law, as this House is well aware, has been to curtail the rights of States.

It has been held in decisions cited here to-day that it is constitutional to prevent States from interfering with interstate commerce. The State which I represent, and there are other States in the same position, come here and say, "As we can not protect ourselves, we ask the Congress of the United States to protect us in our right to arrange our prison system to suit ourselves. We have set aside the system of contract convict labor, and do not want to be made a dumping-ground for the convict-made goods of other States. We do not quarrel with anybody else's system; they are welcome to have any system they like; it is a matter for each State to settle for itself; but we object to having the convict-made goods of other States sold within our borders; we want to maintain our present system in a way to suit ourselves."

The gentleman from Ohio said it would have no effect on labor. Now, let me give a single illustration. In the State of Pennsylvania they make cocoa matting in the State prison. That matting, required to have a convict brand in Pennsylvania, goes out of the State without a convict mark. It has severely crippled the manufacture of such matting in my own State. I have also documents in my desk showing that it has almost annihilated the manufacture in the city of Brooklyn, N. Y. In a small industry this convict competition is well-nigh ruinous, and in a large industry it lowers prices and reduces wages.

I say a bill of this sort is right in principle. I do not say it does not need amendment, for I think it does in one or two points; but a measure of this kind, in justice to the States which are trying to get rid of contract convict labor, and which are seeking rightly and properly to get it out of competition with free labor, ought to be enacted.

Moreover, I think these labor questions are of very great gravity. I know in my own State and in other States the laboring men feel interested in this question; and when they come before Congress with a reasonable request, such as this is, and ask us to aid them by a change of the law so that contract convict labor shall be taken out of the market, I think their request deserves consideration. There has been a good deal said here about petitions and demands for this legislation. I have had but a single letter upon the subject, and I can only say for myself that I advocate this measure because I believe it to be right in principle and for the best interests of the people and the country, and for no other reason or motive.

There are many things falsely asked for in the honest and honorable name of labor, which are neither honest nor honorable nor proper. But I believe that a full and fair consideration of labor questions and a granting of reasonable requests on the part of labor is the greatest security for good government, for general well being, for property, and for every right that we prize most. The strength of the Republic, as it seems to me, rests upon our workingmen and women having good wages. Domestic competition is severe enough and lowers them far enough. Foreign competition which it is proposed by free trade to let in is worse. But I think it is worst of all for us to stand still and allow States with their great power and unlimited resources to come into the market and sell convict labor at such a price that all competition with it on the part of free and honest labor is hopeless. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARUTH].

Mr. CARUTH. Mr. Speaker, great minds differ upon great questions, and we have seen here to-day that great lawyers differ upon the questions whether the proposed bill is constitutional or not. And, sir, as these great lawyers do differ upon this question, the only way that the doubt can be solved is by sending the matter to the courts of the land and leaving them to decide whether or not this is a constitutional measure. We have just concluded a debate which is to be memorable in the history of this country, and we upon this side of the House and the gentlemen upon the other side were all agreed upon one proposition, namely, that at the basis of this whole discussion lay the interests of the laboring people and the workingmen of the United States.

It was merely a matter of speculation as to what the effect of the reduction of the tariff would be upon the laboring interests of the country, we contending that it would have no effect, and gentlemen upon the other side contending that it would lower wages. That discussion, I say, was speculative, but here is something real and tangible. I do not believe, sir, in that kind of missionary work which makes waistcoats for the natives of the Fiji Islands, while it lets our own people at our own doors go naked. Now, there is embodied in the report on this bill the statement, and it is true, that this convict labor is coming into competition with the honest labor of this country; that labor which is hired at 45 and 50 cents a day is brought into competition with labor which represents the comforts and the necessities of not only the workingman himself, but also of his wife and children who are dependent upon him for support. The labor of that honest laboring man is brought into competition with labor which represents merely the food and the meager clothing of the individual convict. I desire to have embodied in my remarks a letter which I have received from a prominent manufacturer in my city in relation to this bill.

I have filed, through the petition-box of this House, the request of the workingmen in my city that this bill be enacted into law. If this convict labor is to come into competition with honest labor then I say it is our duty to protect the honest labor of the country from unfair competition. Let us leave the question of whether or not this bill be constitutional to be solved by the courts while we do the best we can to protect our people from this sort of labor. Reference has been made to the State of Pennsylvania, and we have been told that every dollar's worth of goods manufactured in her prisons are stamped "prison-made." But Pennsylvania in this respect is very selfish, because, while she allows none of the goods manufactured by convict labor to be sold to her own citizens without being duly marked, she does allow those goods to be shipped to markets outside the State, and they are brought into competition with the honest labor of other parts of the country. And that, Mr. Speaker, is the great State which has for its motto "Virtue, liberty, and independence." [Laughter.]

The letter to which I have referred is as follows:

LOUISVILLE, KY., March 30, 1888.

MY DEAR SIR: I understand there is a bill now pending in your House, No. 8716, introduced by Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, having reference to the protection of free labor and honest industry as against convict labor. We have suffered so prodigiously from the operation of this convict system that I dare to call your attention to this subject, and to urge your interest and co-operation in the passage of the bill, which I have just read. It will be unnecessary for me to say to you that the convict labor at Jeffersonville is now turning out enormous amounts of stove hollow-ware with labor which costs them 45 cents per day, while we are striving to compete with them by making the same goods with labor costing from two to three dollars per day. It is an unequal contest, and occurs to me as a great moral and commercial wrong. The time of these convicts should not be consumed in making wares in competition with the honest artisans of our country. It works an oppression upon the hard-laboring man, as well as upon the manufacturer. I feel that this legislation is so eminently needed and proper that I only need to call your attention to the matter. You have always been ready and prompt in your efforts to protect both questions to which I have alluded. May I not hope you will take hold of this question with your usual vigor and ability and assist in placing it among the laws of the land? I feel by so doing you will have performed a great public service.

With much respect and expressions of sincerest friendship, I am,

Yours, very truly,

J. L. SMYSER.

Hon. A. G. CABUTH,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOUND].

Mr. BOUND. Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to make any remarks in regard to this bill until I heard its general object and purpose assailed upon this floor, and statements made that this question did not affect the rights of labor. Sir, I look upon this bill in all that it contemplates as directly tending to protect honest labor in its endeavors to gain an honest living. There are nearly $72,000,000 worth of convict-labor goods put annually upon the markets of this country. There are engaged, directly or indirectly, in the manufacture of those goods from 240,000 to 300,000 convicts. Now, gentlemen need not tell me and need not argue that the throwing out of $72,000,000 worth of convict goods upon the markets of this country will not affect the rights and interests of labor and of laboring men. With a million of workingmen to-day standing idle in the labor market, waiting for employment, men who have wives and children depending upon them for support, you need not argue to me that this is not a question directly affecting those people.

Mr. Speaker, the institutions where goods of this kind are manufactured are supported by the taxes of the people. The very men who are brought into direct competition with this kind of labor are the men who pay the great bulk of the taxes. You rob the laboring men of their money to keep up these institutions. You keep these convicts, you feed them and clothe them, you furnish them shelter, you furnish them with shops in which to work, you furnish them with the very best machinery that can be purchased in the markets of the world, and then you turn around and say that with all these appliances and with some 240,000 to 300,000 convicts thus employed, their labor does not come into competition with the honest labor of the country! Sir, I deny the proposition. You not only do that, but, after imposing taxes upon the laboring men to support these convicts, you place the products of this convict labor in the hands of agents who are paid 10 per cent. to sell them at any price they can get, and they do sell those goods without regard to the effect upon the labor or upon the markets of the country, and pocket their percentage, because that is all they have at stake.

Look at our own Commonwealth. As has been already intimated, we have there in the penitentiaries convicts employed in the manufacture of cocoa-matting to such an extent that this industry, so far as honest labor is concerned, has been absolutely destroyed. In the State of New York another set of convicts are employed in the manufacture of hollow ware, and to such an extent has this manufacture been carried that all individual enterprise in that direction is absolutely crushed out. Do you tell me that these things do not affect the men who were recently employed at remunerative wages in these branches of industry? All the garniture of your cooking-stoves and ranges is now made in the penitentiaries, and those who are engaged in the stove business are now compelled to buy the products of this dishonest labor. It is a shame and disgrace that a great Commonwealth of our country should go into partnership with convicts in the manufacture of products to undersell the products of honest labor. It is a disgrace that the State of Pennsylvania should thus employ her convicts. And whilst she has on her statute-books a law preventing goods thus disgracefully produced from being sold in Pennsylvania, unless clearly marked "convict-made," yet those goods, without that mark, which the State herself places upon them, may be sold across her borders in New York, New Jersey, and elsewhere. Still gentlemen stand here to maintain that there is no power under the Constitution by which we may protect the honest laboring men against the competition of goods thus dishonored and disgraced.

Whatever doubt there may be in regard to the constitutional question involved in the passage of this bill, we are perfectly willing to allow the courts of the country to pass upon that question and say whether the bill is constitutional or not. So far as I am concerned I will resolve the constitutional doubt in favor of honest labor and against convict labor. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. There are several gentlemen who desire to speak, but I am advised that the sooner we reach a vote on this bill the better. I therefore hope that gentlemen who wished to speak will pardon me for now calling the previous question. I will simply give notice that I understand an amendment will be offered extending the time at which the bill will take effect.

Mr. BLAND. I hope my colleague is not going to cut me off from the right to be heard.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. It is now 4 o'clock, and the gentleman must pardon me.

Mr. BLAND. I understood that my colleague was to yield me ten minutes. I do not understand why I should be cut off.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. It is now 4 o'clock, and we have but one hour remaining; it will take all that time to vote on the bill and amendments. [Cries of "Vote! Vote!"]

Mr. BRUMM. There are other gentlemen who want to speak, but they waive their right to do so.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I move the previous question upon the bill and amendments.

In moving the previous question, which is necessary if we expect to reach a vote to-day, as within a short time the House must adjourn under the rule providing for adjournment at 5 p. m., I regret that I am compelled to cut off the following gentlemen to whom I had promised time, as they desired to speak in favor of the bill, namely: Messrs. SHIVELY of Indiana, BUCKALEW of Pennsylvania, WHITE of Indiana, ANDERSON of Kansas, YOST of Virginia, FARQUHAR of New York, and MILLIKEN of Maine.

Mr. RYAN and others sought the floor to offer amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Amendments are not in order pending the motion for the previous question. One amendment was submitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PLUMB], another by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], and another by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. No other amendments can be considered by the Chair as pending if the previous question should now be ordered.

Mr. RYAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] stated that amendments should not be excluded, but that there would be no discussion upon them. I think that was the understanding of the House.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That proposition was made when the gentleman from Missouri was asking unanimous consent for a limitation of time; but as that request was objected to, both propositions fell together.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I am perfectly willing to permit the offering of any amendments which are presented in good faith for the purpose of perfecting the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, gentlemen will now be permitted to send their amendments to the Clerk's desk, to be read in their order as sent up.

There was no objection.

Mr. RYAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "transportation," in line 4 of section 1, insert "for commercial purposes."

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I have no objection to the amendment. If permitted, I will accept it.

The question was taken on Mr. RYAN's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. I move the following amendment to come in at the end of the first section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the provisions of this section shall only apply in cases where the goods, wares, and merchandise, mentioned in said section, are the product of convict labor performed at wages lower than the same class of labor could have been procured outside of prisons and from free laborers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment seems to be rejected.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 99.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLAND. I move the following amendment to come at the end of the bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. There is no objection to taking a vote on that amendment now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the Chair will entertain the amendment for a vote at this time.

Mr. ROGERS. There is so much confusion in the House we can not hear a word of what is going on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If gentlemen will only be patient they will all have an opportunity to offer their amendments. It will also facilitate the business of the House to have gentlemen exercise a little patience.

Mr. BLAND. I ask for the reading of my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the third section of the bill the following:

"Provided, This act shall not take effect or be in force for one year after its passage."

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Shall not take effect until one year after its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Probably this amendment would come at the end of the bill, but if there be unanimous consent it can be considered at this time and voted on.

Mr. BLOUNT. I object to any business out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection being made, the amendment will come up to be voted on at the proper time.

Mr. WARNER. If my colleague's be considered and voted on now it may render unnecessary several amendments which otherwise will be submitted to the preceding sections of the bill.

Mr. BLAND. I thought there was consent given to consider my amendment at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No, it was objected to by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I think it ought to be considered now and disposed of.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been objected to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I move the following amendment to the first section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of section 1 the following:

"And no product or commodity produced by convict labor outside of the United States shall be imported or brought within the United States, and any person or corporation who shall bring or import into the United States, or cause the same to be done, any such product or commodity shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined in a sum not less than double the amount of the value of such product or commodity; and any common carrier who shall import or bring into the United States any such product or commodity shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined upon conviction thereof in a sum not exceeding five times the value of such product or commodity."

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise to a question of order on that amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLOUNT. It is not germane to the pending bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I will say that the committee has reported a separate bill on that subject, which is now pending before this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is in order. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. CANNON. I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is in order, and the gentleman will send it up.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the Chair decide the pending amendment is in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. CANNON. I ask that my substitute be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The importation of all goods, wares, or merchandise from any foreign country into the United States which in whole or in part were manufactured or produced by convict labor is hereby prohibited. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to prescribe rules and regulations for the enforcement of this provision and to enforce the same. Every person who knowingly violates this provision shall be deemed guilty of misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be subject to the penalties and punishment provided in this act.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Let us have a vote. That seems to be all right.

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I make the point of order that the amendment affects the revenue, and must under our rules have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order made on the first amendment was that it was not germane to the pending bill. That point of order the Chair overruled. This point of order, however, is a very different one. The point is made that it affects the revenue and prohibits the importation from foreign countries, and thereby reduces the revenue, because if the law remained as it now is these goods would pay duties to the Government.

Mr. DINGLEY. Let me suggest to the Chair that this question was decided by the Speaker of the House when the retaliation bill was up, and the same point of order was made, that the bill affected the revenue. The Speaker decided on that occasion that it did not come within the meaning of the rule as a revenue bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not think the ruling in that case applies to the present one at all. Whatever goods come in from foreign countries at the present time, whether manufactured in prison or out of it, are subject to the rates of duty prescribed in the tariff law. If this bill be enacted into law it will prohibit those goods coming in and paying the duty upon them. It therefore affects the revenue, and must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to make a parliamentary suggestion. The amendment for which that is a proposed substitute also affects the revenue, and the gentleman having made the point of order upon it, which was overruled, and it being before the House for consideration, it is also before the House for amendment; and I apprehend anything that tends to perfect it would necessarily be in order.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not understand that the amendment is here for consideration. The matter has not been taken up for discussion, has not been debated at all. I raised one question of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, and it is not too late even now, I insist, to raise the other question of order to which that amendment is undoubtedly susceptible. Ordinarily it has been the practice when an amendment was offered and debated that then it was too late; but I do not understand that it has been debated at all, or that there has been any effort to submit it for debate or a vote of the House.

Mr. BRUMM. But an amendment to the amendment was offered, which was equivalent to debate.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to raise the same question on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I insist that the gentleman is too late to raise that now.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Has not the Chair ruled upon the question of order?

Mr. BLOUNT. I have just raised it.

Mr. CANNON. But the point was overruled, and an amendment has been offered.

Mr. BLOUNT. I raised a new point of order, and there has been no intervening business since the first was made.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There was a ruling made by the Chair, and another amendment offered.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I understand the point of order is made that this ought to be first considered in Committee of the Whole. As I heard the remarks of gentlemen around me, they seem to think that bills affecting revenue must be first considered in a Committee of the Whole. I take it if this must be so considered, that it comes under clause 3 of Rule XXIII, and I respectfully ask the attention of the Chair to that clause. It seems to me it does not provide that this amendment must be first considered in Committee of the Whole. The rule declaring what propositions shall go to the Committee on Ways and Means is in the words:

Affecting the revenue.

But in declaring what propositions shall be submitted first to the Committee of the Whole, the language is entirely different and is embodied in clause 3 of Rule XXIII, which I ask the Chair to read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was just reading the clause to which the gentleman refers. The Chair is of opinion that while this proposition might indirectly affect the revenues, and if that point of order had been made at the proper time on this proposition the Chair would perhaps have ruled differently, but having been admitted for consideration in the House, the Chair thinks that any amendment which is analogous to it is in order.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is a copy of the Canada law.

Mr. LONG. I propose to amend the substitute by adding after the word "importation" the words:

For commercial purposes.

Making it read:

Importation for commercial purposes.

The amendment to the substitute was agreed to.

The question being taken on the substitute as amended, it was adopted.

The section as amended by the substitute was adopted.

Mr. HOUK. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 1 add:

"And the words 'goods, wares, and merchandise' are intended and shall be construed to include coal, iron ore, all kinds of marble products, lumber in all its forms, and all other articles of commerce produced, wrought, cut, or mined by convict labor."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I now ask the adoption of the amendment I sent to the desk a short time ago.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 3 by adding the following words:

"Except as to goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured under existing contracts that have been made by any State for the employment of its convict labor, and in such cases this act shall take effect immediately upon the expiration of such contract."

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 102, noes 68.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAND. I move to amend section 3, in the second line, by striking out the words "sixty days" and inserting "one year."

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I move to amend the amendment by making it two years.

The amendment to the amendment was adopted, there being on a division—ayes 91, noes 71.

The amendment as amended was agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 148, noes 21.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I move the previous question upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. DUNN. I desire to make a motion now to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not in order at this time.

Mr. DUNN. I ask, then, to be recognized at the proper time for that purpose.

Mr. GEAR. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GEAR. It is this, whether the gentleman from Missouri can move the previous question after he has given consent and it has been agreed by the House that amendments should be offered to the bill. As long as any amendment is pending I do not think he can move the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri is entitled to the floor and has moved the previous question. The motion is in order.

Mr CLARDY. I want to make a proposition which I think my colleague [Mr. O'NEILL] will agree to, and to which nobody will object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CLARDY. I want to state an amendment which I desire to have made in the amendment already adopted of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] prohibiting the importation of iron ore. I want to insert "lead ores."

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] asks unanimous consent to submit an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee already adopted so as to include lead ores.

There was no objection, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Now I demand a vote on the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question being taken; there were—ayes 110, noes 67.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, and Mr. BLOUNT addressed the Chair.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion for the previous question.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill, and upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not now in order. The previous question has just been ordered on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I have demanded the yeas and nays on the question of ordering the previous question.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. That demand is made too late.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Did the gentleman from Georgia demand the yeas and nays in time?

Mr. BLOUNT. I did; at the first possible moment.

Mr. HOUK. The demand is made too late. The vote had been announced and the result received by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Did the gentleman from Georgia at the time demand the yeas and nays on the motion for the previous question?

Mr. BLOUNT. I did so instantly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the gentleman was in time.

Mr. HOUK. The gentleman may have designed to do it, but he did not until the Chair had announced the result.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Tennessee did not hear me, but other gentlemen did.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair observed the gentleman from Georgia seeking recognition. The Chair did not recognize him at the moment, as the gentleman from Missouri was requesting recognition and the Chair recognized that gentleman. The gentleman from Georgia now states that he demanded the yeas and nays on the motion for the previous question.

The question being put, the yeas and nays were ordered, 70 members voting therefor.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I wish to ask the Chair if upon the vote being taken in favor of the engrossment of the bill it does not come up as unfinished business to-morrow?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is now on ordering the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill, and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Does not the previous question carry the bill over as unfinished business?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. If this roll-call should result in the previous question being ordered, would not the bill come up as unfinished business in the morning?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Speaker, who will occupy the chair at that time, will decide as to that when the occasion arises.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am obliged to the Chair for the information he has communicated to me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the present occupant were the Speaker, he might decide such a question at once; but as it would devolve on the Speaker to decide the point if it should arise to-morrow, the present occupant will not usurp his prerogative.

Mr. WARNER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WARNER. Under the rules of the House have we not to adjourn at 5 o'clock?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is true.

Mr. WARNER. As it is evident we can not get a vote on this proposition before 5 o'clock, I ask, in the interest of the laboring men, that by unanimous consent the time be extended to 6 o'clock, that we may finish this bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I object.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I move that the House take a recess until to-morrow at 10 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Why not?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By a previous order of the House this day's session must close at 5 o'clock, and it is not in order to move a recess at this moment, the yeas and nays having been ordered on a pending proposition.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. And it is not in order to move a recess?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not when the yeas and nays have been ordered on a pending question.

Mr. WARNER. I did not hear objection made to my proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did. The question is, Shall the previous question be now ordered on the engrossment and third reading of the bill?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I desire the motion for a recess shall be considered pending when this is decided.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 185, nays 44, not voting 95; as follows:

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was read a first and second time, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HUDD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Upon examination of the communication the Chair thinks it should have been referred to the Committee on Appropriations; and if there be no objection that reference will be made.

There was no objection, and the communication was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

HARRISON SWANGO.

Mr. TAULBEE. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2351) for the relief of Harrison Swango, and that it be now put on its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Harrison Swango, of Wolfe County, Kentucky, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,655, in full for horses and mules taken from him and converted to the use of Government by the United States Army during the late civil war.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the report will be read.

The report of the Committee on War Claims (by Mr. STONE, of Kentucky) was read, as follows:

Your committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2351) for the relief of Harrison Swango, having carefully examined the claim in the office of the Quartermaster-General, United States Army, Nos. 1701, 1703, 2287, 2291, together with the proof filed with the committee, submit the following report:

Harrison Swango, a farmer residing in Wolfe County, Kentucky, during the late war, filed in the office of the Quartermaster-General, United States Army, a claim based on four counts, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $2,315, for property and stores hereinafter enumerated, and which he claims were taken from him by the United States troops during the late civil war for the actual and necessary use of the Army, and that all of said property and stores were so used.

His claim was rejected on the 27th day of February, 1880, on the ground that the Quartermaster-General was unable to certify that he was convinced of the loyalty of claimant.

His claim was proven by the following witnesses in due form of law, namely, Harrison Swango, W. L. Kash, J. C. Swango, and W. F. Little as to claim for—

6 tons of hay, at $10 per ton	$60
100 bushels of corn, at 75 cents per bushel	75
20 cords of dry wood, at $1.50 per cord	30

which was taken and used by a regiment of Federal soldiers, in charge of Colonel Craner, on or about December 31, 1862, while en route to Prestonburgh, Ky.

Also by claimant and Sarah Ellen Kash and Mariah McLain as to one horse, valued at $125, taken by Capt. Harrison Cockrell while in charge of his company, and was necessary for and used by him in the service of the United States.

Also by the claimant and G. B. Swango and J. C. Swango as to claim for—

18 mules, valued at $85 per head	$1,530
1 horse valued at	125
Total	1,655

These items are each proven to have been taken by and used in the service of the United States Army; the last-named items, 18 mules and 1 horse, were taken by Col. John Dils while in charge of a portion of his regiment on a raid.

Also, by Sarah Ellen Kash, Darius Brooks, and claimant, as to claim for 200 bushels of corn, valued at 75 cents per bushel, $150, taken and used by Federal soldiers on or about April 1, 1864, by a Michigan regiment commanded by one Colonel Brown.

All of the above-named witnesses appear to be credible and of good character for truth and veracity.

On the question of claimant's loyalty, seven witnesses testify to the effect that they resided in the same neighborhood during the late war from and including the year 1861 to and including the year 1866, and that his loyalty was never questioned to their knowledge. Said witnesses were all loyal to the United States Government during the late war.

Hon. George M. Adams, while a member of the Forty-third Congress, certifies that he knew claimant well, and never heard his loyalty to the United States Government questioned.

W. P. TAULBEE, a member of the Fifty-first Congress, says:

"I have known claimant, Harrison Swango, well, from before the late civil war to the present; he was reputed to be loyal to the United States Government throughout the war. I know all the witnesses who testify in his claims embraced in bill H. R. No. 4044, in Forty-ninth Congress. Each of said witnesses is of good character for truth."

The record nowhere bears any intimation of disloyalty on the part of claimant, save in a letter of one J. G. Trumbull, agent of the Quartermaster's Department, who states that the claimant was reputed in his neighborhood as being disloyal during the late war.

Your committee, in view of the foregoing statement of facts, report back the bill, and recommend its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have not observed in that report any evidence from the quartermaster or any of the Federal officers that this property was taken.

Mr. TAULBEE. An examination of the report will show that the evidence in support of this claim was taken from the records of the Quartermaster-General's Office. The claim is based entirely on that evidence, except a statement of one of my predecessors in this House and of myself upon the question of the claimant's loyalty.

Mr. BURROWS. Does the gentleman know the witnesses who have testified in this case?

Mr. TAULBEE. Every one of them; and they are all entitled to full credit; they are neighbors of mine.

Mr. BUCHANAN. What price has been allowed for the mules which are to be paid for?

Mr. TAULBEE. About $80 a head.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I believe that is lower than the average price.

Mr. BURROWS. I would like to know whether the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] is personally acquainted with the witness who testifies as to the disloyalty of the claimant.

Mr. TAULBEE. No witness testified as to that.

Mr. BURROWS. I thought there was a letter to that effect.

Mr. TAULBEE. The letter on which the claim was rejected was written by J. G. Trumbull, an agent of the Quartermaster's Department, who stated that the claimant was reputed in his neighborhood to have been disloyal; but the loyalty of the claimant is proved by a number of witnesses.

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman from Kentucky does not personally know the man who wrote that letter?

Mr. TAULBEE. No, sir; I do not. He was an agent of the Quartermaster-General's Department who was sent to investigate the claim.

Mr. HUNTER. Was there any evidence showing disloyalty on the part of the claimant?

Mr. TAULBEE. Not a bit.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to call attention to the fact that the claims for the adjustment of which provision was made by the act of July 4, 1864, known as "the 4th of July law," amounted to something over $60,000,000. Those claims have now been almost entirely adjusted and acted on, or disposed of by Congress. This bill and a few others which have preceded it propose to open up in particular cases the action of the tribunal which was authorized under "the 4th of July law" to adjust those claims.

I understand that this claim was rejected at the Department, and rejected, perhaps, on the ground of want of proof of loyalty. The committee, however, believe that the claimant was loyal and is entitled to be paid. I wish to suggest that at an early moment the question must arise whether these cases should be taken up one after another and acted on in this special way as a matter of favoritism or whether all these claims as a class shall undergo revision. I think the passage of particular claims through Congress in this way is the worst kind of special legislation; and while I shall not object to the consideration of this bill, I must insist that the practice which has sprung up in the last two Congresses of opening up these cases ought to be discontinued. If, as a general thing, these claims have not been adjusted on a proper basis, although the parties have had their day in court, the whole subject should be opened up and some system of review adopted.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to know if the gentleman from Indiana objects to the consideration at this time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am consenting that it shall come before the House for a vote.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the bill will be considered as engrossed and read the third time; and the question recurs on its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask a vote on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. TAULBEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY RESERVATION, FORT LEAVENWORTH.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1747) to authorize the sale of a tract of land in the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Leavenworth City and Fort Leavenworth Water Company, of Leavenworth, Kans., a body corporate organized and existing under the laws of the State of Kansas, shall have the right to purchase from the United States that parcel and tract of land in the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, State of Kansas, bounded and described as follows: Beginning at a point on the north line of Metropolitan avenue in the extension of the west line of the land owned by the Leavenworth Coal Company; thence north in the extension of said west line 500 feet; thence east parallel to the north line of Metropolitan avenue 820 feet, more or less, to railroad right of way; thence on the west line of said right of way 503 feet, more or less, to the north line of Metropolitan avenue; thence west on the north line of Metropolitan avenue 850 feet, more or less, to the place of beginning; containing 9¼ acres, more or less, reserving to the United States or assigns the coal or royalty for coal underlying the same.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to appoint a commission of three competent Army officers, which shall, without unnecessary delay, examine and report the value of the tract of land hereinbefore described, and report to the Secretary of War. On receipt of such report the Secretary of War shall forward a certified copy thereof to each the Secretary of the Interior and the Leavenworth City and Fort Leavenworth Water Company: Provided, That the report of the board of Army officers on the subject of the value of the land in question shall not be operative until the same is approved by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 3. That whenever the Leavenworth City and Fort Leavenworth Water Company aforesaid, being thus notified of the valuation of the said lands, shall pay to the Secretary of War, in lawful money, the amount of said appraisal, and shall notify the Secretary of the Interior of such payment, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be issued to the Leavenworth City and Fort Leavenworth Water Company a patent to the said lands, and on such deposit being made and notice to the Secretary of the Interior being given the said company may enter upon, possess, use, and occupy the said lands.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, and being read the third time, was passed.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I now demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to dispense with the call of committees for reports, and also ask unanimous consent that members having reports to make from committees may be permitted to file them with the Clerk.

The motion to dispense with the morning hour was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the request of the gentleman from Georgia, that members having reports from committees may file them with the Clerk, will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. TURNER, of Georgia, in the chair.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the first bill on the Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9345) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, this bill appropriates the sum of $60,035,840.74, while the amount estimated which will be provided by the Department from its own revenue, arising from postage and other sources, is $57,563,734.32. The cost of the service for the current year, as appears from the appropriation bill now in force, is $55,694,650.50, which is to be supplemented by the items in the deficiency bill passed during this session, amounting to $146,000, making a total appropriation for the current year of $55,840,650.15. The appropriations proposed by this bill for the year ending June 30, 1889, exceed those of the current year by the sum of $4,194,190.59, while the deficit in the revenues of the Department for 1889 will be $2,472,106.42.

The appropriations for 1889 it will be seen, therefore, exceed the appropriations for the current year by an unusually large sum, and it is therefore but proper that the House should understand the reasons for this increase. It is largely made up, sir, by an increase in the compensation of postmasters, pay of clerks in post-offices, and the free-delivery system. The compensation for postmasters for the fiscal year 1888 was $11,700,000, while the Sixth Auditor states that the expenditures for this item in 1887 will amount to $11,929,481.41, or an increase of $229,481.41 over and above the appropriations for 1888. So that we shall have a deficiency on that item for this current fiscal year.

It becomes necessary therefore, in estimating for the increase for the year 1889, to take into account the shortness of the estimate made for 1888, and it is but proper for me to state to the House that the estimates and the appropriations were not sufficient to meet the expenditures on account of the service, because of the extraordinarily large increase in mail matter. For instance, the rate of increase of revenue for 1876 was 3.26 per cent., while the increase for 1887 is more than 11 per cent., and the estimated increase for 1889 will be quite as large.

Mr. COX. Is that an average increase?

Mr. BLOUNT. It is unusually large.

This increased appropriation is larger than any known in the previous history of the service, and necessarily so. It could not have been anticipated when the estimates were made up.

Another large item of increase is in relation to the compensation of clerks in post-offices. There has been a good deal of complaint in relation to this matter for more than a year, perhaps for two years past. It has been justly made, without fault on the part of any one.

Mr. ROGERS. Will it interrupt my friend to make an inquiry there for information?

Mr. BLOUNT. No, sir.

Mr. ROGERS. Do I understand the appropriation you are now discussing covers the current year, or does it look simply to the coming fiscal year?

Mr. BLOUNT. It is for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889.

Mr. ROGERS. And does not touch this year?

Mr. BLOUNT. Oh, no; not at all. In 1887 Congress provided a change in the mode of paying clerks in the money-order service. Up to that time they had been paid out of the fees of that service. Before the passage, however, of that law the appropriation bill had passed through this House on the old idea that the money-order clerks were paid out of the fees and the other clerks out of the general fund. After this had been done the statute to which I have referred provided that the clerks, money-order clerks, and all should be paid out of the compensation for clerks in the post-offices. The consequence was that the appropriation bill which passed necessarily took no account of this change of legislation, which occurred subsequently. In the following winter an estimate was made for a deficiency by reason of this change of law; and gentlemen who were in Congress at that time, and perhaps others now members, will remember that the bill providing for this deficiency failed to receive the President's signature, and hence there was not a sufficient fund.

In addition to that it was estimated, at the time of the change of the legislation so as to pay the clerks out of the compensation of clerks for the post-offices, that the consolidation would decrease the total amount to be used for both purposes, for the reason that the money-order clerk could be paid out of no other fund, because the fees could not be utilized for any other purpose than the money-order business, and vice versa.

This opinion was furnished by the head of the money-order division, whose long and large experience invited confidence. But, sir, it only shows that no matter how experienced an officer may be, the elements of the service are so uncertain and so changeable that there is likely to be mistake.

Again, sir, the increase of mail matter, as I have just stated, has been unprecedented in the history of the country. The increase in the year 1886 over the year 1885 was 3.26 per cent., while the increase of 1887 over 1886 was over 11 per cent. So that it appears that by reason of two facts—first, a misapprehension as to the saving to be effected by the law; secondly, a misapprehension as to the increase of mail matter—there was thrust upon the Post-Office Department an amount of mail matter which could not be handled with facility and for which no person is responsible.

Now, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads and the present Postmaster-General, fully appreciating the situation, or endeavoring to do it, feeling that the provision for handling the mail matter in the post-offices of the country had been inadequate, determined to ask for an additional appropriation in order to avoid a repetition of this trouble. And so on page 8 of the report accompanying this bill is to be found an estimate for an increase over the amount which had been estimated for in the report of the Postmaster-General of last year. The estimate in 1887 was $5,650,000; but considering the situation, the officer at present in charge of the Post-Office Department asked that the amount be increased to $6,000,000. There had been appropriated $5,450,000 for the current fiscal year; so that we have an increase of $550,000 for the item alone of compensation of clerks in post-offices; and we not only thought it was proper this increase should be given in order that the mails might be easily handled, but we further believe that by reason of the strain upon the appropriations there had been a reduction in allowances in the post-offices of the country, so that the amount was not adequate to the compensation of the clerks employed therein.

In the matter of light, rent, and fuel an increase was made of $50,000 over the appropriation in the bill for 1888; the expenditure has not been so much. During this present fiscal year, however, there has been provided, in addition to the appropriation, $25,000, and this unusual increase in the item of light, rent, and fuel was made because of the immense additions to the mails. It was found that in a great many cities of the country increased facilities in the way of post-offices were necessary, and the committee deemed that it was due to the service and due to the people of the country that there should be no constraint in the matter of a place for the purpose of depositing or distributing the mails.

Another item of increase is in relation to the compensation of postmasters of the third class, in the matter of allowing them rent, light, and fuel. It is well known that under the present subdivision we have first, second, third, and fourth class postmasters; that the first and second class are entitled to rent, light, and fuel; that the first, second, and third class postmasters are salaried officers, and the fourth class are paid commissions on receipts.

Now, sir, the fact that you gave the third-class postmaster a salary which appeared sufficient is utterly changed in its aspect when you come to deduct from that salary which you provided for him by law, the expense of the rent of a post-office building and of light and fuel for the same.

The Postmaster-General in his report has called attention to this matter. I will read from that report what is perhaps familiar to every gentleman in the House by reason of his experience with the postmasters in his section of the country. He says:

> Yet from the third-class postmaster, who has so much less than the others in nominal salary, is taken "even that which he hath." To him no allowance (except in a case which is no exception, that of the separating office) for rent, light, fuel, clerical service, stationery, or other outgo whatever is made, but all must be defrayed from his miscalled salary, which thus proves too often, instead of the apparently promised reward of labor, but the weak residuum of a well-nigh exhausted cup. The consequences are, first, injustice, more or less, to all postmasters of the third class, and frequent instances of grotesque inequality and unfairness in the proportion of labor and responsibility to net compensation; and, secondly, a resulting tendency to poorer provision and service in such offices, only counterbalanced by the pride and sense of duty of the officer.
> Salaries of the third class vary from $1,000, where gross receipts are $1,900 and not exceeding $2,100, to $1,900, where gross receipts reach $7,000 but not over $8,000; and immediately following, salaries of the second class rise from $2,000, for gross receipts of $8,000 and not over $9,000, to $2,900, for gross receipts of $35,000 or more and not exceeding $40,000. Thus, if the business of an office be between $7,900 and $8,000, the postmaster must bear the entire charges of it and have for himself only what shall be left of $1,900; while if the business be but $100 more the postmaster may take $2,000 net for his services, and these often more of mere easy supervision than actual office work. Instances have come to my attention where third-class postmasters with salaries of but $1,600 to $1,700 have been compelled, in order to provide such service as to satisfy their sense of personal honor in performance of public duty, to make an annual outlay of from $1,000 to 1,300, besides giving continuing personal labor. It is obvious, indeed, that so great is the difference between the decent provision of an office for the transaction of postal business yielding annually $7,000 or more and one yielding but from $1,900 to $2,100, it may be almost affirmed that as a third-class postmaster's business and salary increase his compensation diminishes; and it is to be safely asserted that, in a large majority of cases at least, his proportionable compensation (to labor and responsibility) will surely diminish if he fairly discharges his obligations to the service. Such a condition is neither creditable to the justice of the Government nor wisely conducive to the finished service which should be exacted of postmasters to the public.

Believing that the House would appreciate the force and justice of the criticisms made by the Postmaster-General in the extract which I have just read in relation to the present compensation of third-class postmasters, I asked unanimous consent on the 2d day of March of this year that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads should be allowed to place in the Post-Office appropriation bill for consideration by the House a proposition authorizing allowances for rent, light, and fuel in third-class offices. That was agreed to, and the rule prohibiting new legislation on appropriation bills was thereby suspended, and the committee have accordingly inserted that provision in this bill.

Mr. DUNN. Does the provision include water-rates in cities?

Mr. BLOUNT. No, sir. A careful estimate was made, and it was found that the increased allowance for rent, light, and fuel in third-class offices would amount to $650,607. Heretofore, as I have already stated, rent, light, and fuel have been allowed only at first and second class offices, and the appropriation for that purpose in the bill is $550,000. It will be seen, therefore, that by this new provision we have more than doubled the total allowance in the bill for rent, light, and fuel. I think that what has been said in reference to the compensation of offices of the third class, the injustice of the Government, and the inefficiency of the service that results from getting incompetent men, will justify any gentleman in concluding that this branch of the postal service is of sufficient importance to authorize doubling, if need be, the appropriation for rent, light, and fuel; and, entertaining that view, the committee have not hesitated to report it in the bill.

Mr. LANHAM. Is there any provision made for increasing the pay of fourth-class postmasters?

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend asks me whether any provision is made in the bill for increasing the pay of fourth-class postmasters. I answer there is not; and I presume my friend would like to know the reason?

Mr. LANHAM. I would.

Mr. BLOUNT. The rules of this House prohibit new legislation on appropriation bills. I believe, and the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads believe, that there ought to be an increase of the compensation of that class of officers, and the matter is now under consideration by the committee. When the request was made for leave to insert an item for rent, light, and fuel, the necessity of it was so indisputable that there was no controversy about it, and so we ventured to ask unanimous consent to insert that appropriation; but the differences of opinion as to what the rate of compensation of fourth-class postmasters should be would necessarily involve some dispute, and the committee did not think that the House would be willing to give them authority to insert legislation on that subject in this bill.

Mr. SHIVELY. But the committee were unanimously in favor of a proposition to increase the compensation of fourth-class postmasters, were they not?

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat embarrassed by the rule of the House when I am asked to state what the members of the committee were in favor of.

Mr. LIND. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. LIND. I will ask the chairman whether a resolution was not offered in the committee on this subject and made a matter of record there; and, if the answer of the chairman should be in the affirmative, then I should like to know whether it is any breach of the courtesy due to the committee, or against any rule of the House, to state upon this floor what that record is?

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the rules of the House forbid my stating what is going on in the committee, but, for the convenience of my friend, I will assume that what he says is true. At the same time I can see that even with that record, which can not change any rule of the House, the committee has no right to report one particle of new legislation in this appropriation bill, except by the consent of the House, as in the case of the item for rent, light, and fuel in third-class offices. I do not, however, think that there ought to be any uneasiness or haste in getting out to the country the disposition of the Committee on the Post-Offices and Post-Roads in reference to the compensation of fourth-class postmasters. I believe that it will not be a great while before we shall report some conclusion on that subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman—perhaps he has already stated it, but if so I did not hear the statement—what is the estimated deficiency for the coming year?

Mr. BLOUNT. The estimated deficiency for the coming year is $2,472,106.42. But that requires explanation. That is my own estimate, which I will explain in a moment.

The deficiency, as estimated by the Treasury Department, is $1,403,499.42, which I have increased on account of additional estimates made by the Post-Office Department, as appears on pages 8 and 22 of the report accompanying the bill, and on account of the allowance for rent, light, and fuel in third-class offices. This addition having been made, and assuming the estimate of the Treasury Department to be correct, there is a deficiency of $2,472,106.42. And if my friend will allow me, I wish to add that this is not all. I know this announcement will be painful to him; it is so to me. Some time ago there was passed through this House a bill reported from the Committee on Labor, fixing eight hours as the daily term of labor for letter-carriers. That bill has passed the Senate and gone to the President. If it should become a law, it will necessitate an increase of about $1,300,000 in this single item of the service; so that the increased cost of the service will be something over $3,700,000 for the next fiscal year.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my friend will allow one further inquiry. In view of this deficiency of nearly $4,000,000 in the Post-Office Department, does the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads think it proper to increase in a very material degree the expenses of offices of the third class, where the compensation is at present and has been for years reasonably fair?

Mr. BLOUNT. Does my friend mean to ask whether I think it right to make the allowance for rent, light, and fuel at third-class offices?

Mr. HOLMAN. In that particular field of expense, where the compensation is at least reasonable, does the committee think the expenditures should be materially increased, in view of this very considerable deficiency?

Mr. BLOUNT. If the facts justified the statement of my friend from Indiana that these postmasters are well paid, and that a very large deficiency is likely to occur, I would answer him that in my opinion this increase ought not to be made; but I will ask my friend whether he is not aware that the Postmaster-General, in two reports, has called the attention of Congress to the fact that the withholding of any allowance to third-class postmasters for rent, light, and fuel is a gross injustice to them and affects the efficiency of the service, by making the offices undesirable on account of the reduction of the nominal compensation, by reason of the expenses now paid by these officers for rent, light, and fuel.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is a subject, Mr. Chairman, with which all members of the House are familiar. The information is all around us.

Mr. DUNN. Let me give you, then, some information right there.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not now.

Mr. DUNN. Then you do not want the information which members have on this subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly I do.

Mr. DUNN. Do you not think it is all wrong to cast the deficiency of one service upon another?

Mr. HOLMAN. I put it upon the ground the compensation of third-class postmasters should be reasonable and fair, but at the same time is it right and proper to increase in this particular bill a deficiency in the postal service already existing? I know my friend from Georgia and myself have been occupying that ground in former years, that the deficiency should not be increased.

Mr. MCCREARY rose.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky in a moment. The gentleman from Indiana refers to a change of ground on my part which he and I occupied in former years. I wish to say, sir, the change of ground has not been so great on my part as it has been on the part of the gentleman from Indiana, as I will indicate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not intend to have it implied by the remark which I made that there was any change in the position of the gentleman from Georgia. What I meant was simply this: That the gentleman and myself have insisted we would, as far as possible, make this Department of the Government self-supporting; that it should be self-supporting, and the postal deficiency, at least, should not reach large sums of money.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to say so far as this Department is not self-sustaining the gentleman from Indiana is as much responsible for it as any other gentleman in the United States. In the first place he has as much as any other person had to do with the reduction of the rate of postage from 3 cents a half-ounce to 2 cents an ounce on letters.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is true.

Mr. BLOUNT. And the gentleman from Indiana had as much to do as anybody else with the enormous reduction of postage on newspapers or second-class mail matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend is right about that.

Mr. BLOUNT. Wait until I get through. Mr. Chairman, but for that legislation, to-day we would have an excess of receipts over expenditures amounting to several millions of dollars. I had no part in that legislation.

Mr. HOLMAN. You did not agree to that, I believe.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have not kept up with every little thing I did, and as to that I do not remember.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not either.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am well assured that at the time it was regarded as a hasty matter. It had not been recommended by any Department of the Government. It had not been expected by any member of the House outside of that committee. There was no popular demand for it so far as I know. The gentleman and his associates agreed in reporting these reductions; and now my friend, because of these reductions, comes in here and criticises the rate of compensation to third-class postmasters.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is a deficiency.

Mr. DUNN. Does the gentleman think these third-class postmasters ought to pay it?

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend from Indiana has brought the matter up, and let me say that in 1878 I had the honor of reporting the Post-Office appropriation bill for that year. That was ten years ago. My friend from Indiana was on the subcommittee that made it up. I find the deficiency in the postal reductions at that time was over $4,000,000.

The increase in the expenditures for the whole service has reached about 60 per cent. The increase in the item of compensation to railroads has increased nearly 100 per cent. And during all this period, by reason of the reduction in the rates of postage, there has been a continued depreciation in the rates of compensation paid to postmasters throughout the country. And finding, sir, as we did, that with this mail service enormously increased the postmasters of the country in third-class offices are inadequately paid and the deficiency in the revenue was very small as compared with previous years, only a small percentage coming out of the Treasury of the United States, we deemed it an unreasonable, unjust, and improper thing to leave the compensation as stated by the Postmaster-General.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Georgia refers, as the cause of the deficiency, to the reduction of postage on newspapers. The policy of those measures, it seems to me, has been vindicated by experience. They were proper measures, and neither my friend nor any other member of the House would be in favor of going back to the old rates.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman say I am in favor of going back?

Mr. HOLMAN. No; but, on the contrary, that neither my friend nor any other member in the House proposes to go back to the old rates of postage. I admit those two measures were made by the Committee on Appropriations upon a general appropriation bill. And the whole point I wish to make—for I have always admired the course of my friend in regard to this bill, not only while in charge of it as chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, when he had charge of it in the Committee on Appropriations—the only point I desire to make and the only criticism is this, that while the Post-Office Department is so well administered as it now is, and of that fact there is no shadow of doubt, it never was better administered in the whole history of the country than now, everywhere and in every class, first, second, third, and fourth—I submit then, in view of that condition of affairs, whether it is a proper thing now to increase the compensation of any class of postmasters while this large deficiency exists.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to submit an inquiry to my friend from Indiana in this very connection. He has, I believe, some third-class postmasters in his district?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes; a great many.

Mr. BLOUNT. And by reason of that fact the gentleman is doubtless informed as to whether they regard their compensation as proper and sufficient or not. I ask, then, if he has any information as to those offices in his district which would justify Congress in withholding an allowance for rent, light, and fuel to these men?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am aware that the third-class postmasters claim that they are not adequately paid; and besides that, they should be allowed rent, light, and fuel. But at the same time, while the administration of the office in all of its departments is so satisfactory, I insist that this large deficit in its revenues should first be made up before such increases are allowed.

Mr. BLOUNT. And the gentleman does not think, then, the allowance ought to be made?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have simply made the suggestion owing to the present condition of the revenues of the Department.

Mr. BLOUNT. But I would like to know whether the proposition of the committee meets his approval or not.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am not prepared to say whether it should be done. The point is——

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, I am prepared to say, as a member of the committee, and it meets their approval after a careful investigation: and I think my friend from Indiana ought not to take up our time, for we have considered it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am not prepared to express a positive opinion on that point, as I have said, only to the extent that at this time I think the increase ought not to be made.

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend does not express an opinion——

Mr. HOLMAN. I express an opinion as clearly as I can at the present time. I have stated that in my judgment it was not wise to make this increase until the deficiency existing has been removed. I will not, however, make the point of order upon the proposition.

Mr. BLOUNT. But my friend can move to strike it out if he thinks it is wrong.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall not make the motion unless there is a prospect of its being carried.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman can try it.

Mr. MCCREARY. Will the gentleman from Georgia permit me to ask a question? Have not the second-class postmasters been allowed rent, fuel, and lights for some time past?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCCREARY. Now, if the third-class postmasters have been furnishing office-room, is it not proper that they should also have an allowance for rent, light, and fuel?

Mr. HOLMAN. Why not extend it to the fourth class?

Mr. MCCREARY. Because they rarely furnish office-room.

Mr. BLOUNT. In answer to the gentleman from Kentucky, the Postmaster-General shows now, and has time and again urged upon Congress, the necessity for making this allowance; and we did not feel, charged as we are by the House with the interest of that great service—we did not feel that we could properly afford to neglect to consider that recommendation or fail to report an honest conclusion to the House in that connection in the interest of the service, even if we should be subjected to criticism that we were not as economical as we might have been.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that I have referred to the principal items of increase embodied in this bill. While there are some other items asked for by supplementary reports, they are mainly of such small amounts that I do not think them of sufficient importance to postpone the further consideration of the bill to discuss them, because they can be explained under the five-minute rule. I do not, therefore, desire to make further comments upon the bill unless some gentleman wishes information in regard to certain portions of it.

Mr. ROGERS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. What is the increase for clerk-hire in this bill over the current appropriation?

Mr. BLOUNT. The appropriation in the present bill for compensation of clerks in post-offices is $5,950,000. In addition to that there is an item of $50,000 allowance to clerks for extra work, making a total of $6,000,000 as against $5,450,000 appropriated by the bill of the current year.

Mr. ROGERS. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks this increase, which is something less than $600,000, is a sufficient increase to meet the increased demands of the service.

Mr. BLOUNT. The committee are of the impression that it is sufficient?

Mr. ROGERS. Do you think it will meet the increased demands of the service in that line?

Mr. BLOUNT. In that connection permit me to say that being conscious from experience and by communication with my associates on this floor, as well as from other sources, of the demands for increase in this branch of the service, as I have stated, and that the amount appropriated for clerks in post-offices was not sufficient, and that it was the point in the whole service of which just complaint might be made above all others, I invited the attention of the Postmaster-General to the matter, who fully appreciating its importance took up the whole subject and has gone into it most carefully, and another and second estimate was made in addition to the one contained in the Book of Estimates for the purpose of making ample provision to meet all the requirements of this branch of the service.

Mr. ROGERS. Is this the appropriation recommended by the Postmaster-General?

Mr. BLOUNT. This is the appropriation recommended by the present Postmaster-General. And I wish to say, so far as I am concerned, and so far as I have an opinion as to the disposition of the committee, we are not willing to withhold one single dollar where it is needed for the distribution of the mails of this country.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman does not object to being interrupted——

Mr. BLOUNT. Not at all.

Mr. COX. I would like to ask him whether or not he has made disposition for a proper classification of the railway clerks and the postal clerks so as to give them adequate compensation according to certain bills which have been sent to his committee, or whether he reserves that until proper information from the Department shall have come to him, and whether there is any prospect of making that reform in our service?

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, those bills have been referred to a subcommittee, and I am not authorized at this time, under the rules of the House, to make any statement as to their condition.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman state to us that there is a reasonable prospect of success? I think the Postmaster-General would favor every one of them. I do not, however, wish to press the gentleman from Georgia to make any statement he does not desire to make.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to say this to the members of this House. There never was such a clamor for increase of salaries encountered by any party from the beginning of this Government as we are having at this time. There is an organization among the clerks in post-offices and an organization of railway clerks; and they do not, as a general rule, come before committees for the purpose of stating the system of compensation they desire and the reasons for it, but they are in the habit in these latter days of formulating their bills and placing them in the hands of some prominent member of this House. Such a bill takes his name, and in this way we are expected to be driven to conclusions and resort to improper methods of legislation.

I wish to say, so far as I am concerned, I am not concluded by the action of any body of officers as to what compensation they wish to have in the future. I represent not the office-holders alone of this country, but the great masses of the people in the land who pay the taxes, and for one I shall withstand as far as lies in my power any unreasonable increase of salaries.

Mr. COX. I wish to ask the gentleman from Georgia if the Postmaster-General does not favor the increase of the compensation of railway clerks, and whether all this remarkable withstanding of his would not require him to withstand the Postmaster-General also?

Mr. BLOUNT. I have more trouble in withstanding the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] than I have in withstanding the Postmaster-General. [Laughter]. I will say that has been the case whenever it came to the compensation of letter-carriers and other office-holders in New York City.

Mr. COX. I am in favor of popular arrangements by which people will be paid their quid pro quo.

Mr. BLOUNT. No doubt of it. But I would be glad, speaking of those of us who see fit to make economical arrangements, if the gentleman from New York would stand with us here and not fight us, and then clamor hereafter over the results of his own action.

Mr. COX. I think I have always been with the gentleman from Georgia on economical arrangements.

Mr. BLOUNT. I take back what I suggested.

Mr. COX. I was sure you would.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield to me for a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is it not the fact that what the gentleman from New York asks is prohibited by a rule of the House from being put on an appropriation bill?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir; and that is my trouble. I propose to have it done in some other way, if it is to be done.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman proposes—

> To make assurance doubly sure
> And take a bond of fate.

According to Shakespeare or Bacon.

Mr. BLOUNT. I reserve the balance of my time. I desire to know if any gentleman desires to discuss the bill in general debate?

Mr. BINGHAM. I did not understand the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia as to time.

Mr. BLOUNT. The proposition is to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] what time he wants. I know he is altogether reasonable.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman concede two hours of time on this side?

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope my friend will not ask that much.

Mr. BINGHAM. I only want five or ten minutes myself; but several gentlemen on this side desire time. The gentleman on my right desires to be heard; the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LIND], my colleague on the committee, desires some time. I do not think gentlemen on this side would be disposed to agree to any proposition giving less time than two hours. As to the bill itself, I give it my hearty, unqualified approval.

Mr. BLOUNT. I submit to my friend from Pennsylvania that it is now late in the session, and we have passed but few appropriation bills; and there is a desire now to reach the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. As this bill carries $60,000,000, certainly two hours' discussion of it, in view of the declarations which have been made, can not be objected to.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman mean two hours on other subjects?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Is not the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] entitled to time in his own right?

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no desire to cut off members of the committee. What does the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations say about it?

Mr. RANDALL. I will answer that question. I do not want to interfere with what is right as to the discussion of this bill, but I hope the gentleman from Georgia will limit the time as much as he can properly do, because the Committee on Appropriations are anxious to proceed and finish as speedily as possible the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I appreciate what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] says, and while I want to be agreeable I doubt very much whether I ought to consent to four hours of general debate.

Mr. BINGHAM. This is a bill carrying $60,000,000, and certainly two hours for discussion on the Republican side is not an unreasonable time to ask.

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend [Mr. BINGHAM] has already stated that the bill and everything in it are all right.

Mr. BINGHAM. I was speaking only for myself when I said that.

Mr. COX. All that is in it may be all right, but we want some more things in it which will be equally right. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLOUNT. The best way to accomplish that object is to offer them as amendments when the bill is under consideration by paragraphs.

Mr. COX. I wish to ask the gentleman now whether, if I should move as amendments the bills which I have proposed for the classification of the railway mail clerks, and for the classification of clerks in first-class offices, he will make the point of order on me? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not want to assume that my friend would make such a proposition as that.

Mr. COX. I want to save time. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not assume that my friend would make such a proposition as that, because if he has investigated the matter and knows all that is necessary to be known about it he has withheld the information from the committee, and the Post-Office Department itself has not been able to furnish us the data necessary to reach a conclusion.

Mr. COX. It has in relation to one of the bills.

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, we have not got the information in the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] will be recognized as entitled to the floor, unless some arrangement is made with regard to the time.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have been using my time endeavoring to arrive at such an arrangement.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to say to the chairman of the committee that if I am recognized I am recognized for an hour.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes; but I know that when my friend sees that I am using my time for the purpose of reaching a conclusion with reference to the disposition of the time, he will not want to defeat that effort.

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, no; I wish to say to the chairman that while there seems to be some indisposition on his part to concede two hours to this side for discussion my friends that are around me here are asking for more time.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to know whether any gentleman on this side of the House desires to discuss the bill.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I do, Mr. Chairman. I should like to have about a half hour.

Mr. BLOUNT. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that four hours be allowed for general debate, including the time that has already been used—two hours on either side. I ask unanimous consent that that be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be limited to four hours, including the time that has been already occupied.

Mr. BLOUNT. Which is one hour, as I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition would limit the general debate to three hours from this time.

Mr. BINGHAM. One hour having been already consumed by the other side.

Mr. BLOUNT. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I do not wish to object, Mr. Chairman, but I should like to know how the time is to be disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the indication already given and under the practice of the House, the Chair would feel bound to allot two hours of the time to the other side, and one hour to the committee reporting the bill; one hour having already been consumed on that side.

Mr. DOCKERY. I wish to say that I have already made a request of the chairman for recognition as a member of the subcommittee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] is recognized.

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS. Did the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] use his full hour?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] used his entire hour except about three minutes, which has been consumed in this discussion.

Mr. BLOUNT. But I understood, Mr. Chairman, that that would not be counted against me.

The CHAIRMAN. Then there are three minutes remaining of the gentleman's hour.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has three minutes remaining, and he yields that to me before the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] takes the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. With the consent, then, of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] for three minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, a few minutes ago I asked the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] whether he regarded the increased appropriation proposed in this bill for clerk-hire for the coming fiscal year as adequate to the increase and growth of the service. To that question my friend from Georgia made a response in the greater portion of which I heartily concur—a response in substance that many of these office-holders organize, get up their own bills, and make their own requests, and occasionally undertake to conclude our judgment as to what is right. I wish now to say that, so far as concerns this branch of the service to which I now particularly address myself, I do not know of any co-operation whatever; and while I hope that this increased appropriation for clerk-hire will meet adequately the demand of the service, and while I am gratified that the Department has given this matter careful consideration, I do sincerely hope that the experience of the current fiscal year with reference to this branch of the service, more particularly in the Western and rapidly developing districts of the country, will not be necessary during the coming fiscal year.

I can say—and I say it from personal knowledge—that in at least one post-office of my district the clerks have been compelled either to resign or else to work from 4 or 5 o'clock in the morning until 10, 11, 12, and even as late as 1 o'clock at night, day after day, depending on the arrival of the trains, Sundays included. I do not believe that such a condition of things should exist in this branch of the service, which affects so closely the convenience and comfort of the people throughout the land. Time after time clerks in that office have resigned and gone out of the service, because they were unwilling to undergo the hardships incident to their positions; and the retirement of officers in this way has operated to the detriment of the service, for there is no branch of the public business which requires to a greater extent skilled labor than do the post-offices of the country in the distribution of the mails.

I do not mean to say that this condition of things has been universal; but in those districts where the country is developing rapidly and population increasing by the thousands and ten thousands annually, it is almost impossible for the Department to make accurate estimates or for Congress to make exactly proper appropriations. Sometimes the gross receipts at a particular office may increase $500, $1,000, $2,000, or even $3,000 in a single quarter; yet the same number of clerks, without additional assistance or increase of salary, must go on discharging the duties of the service until the end of the quarter enables a readjustment of clerk-hire adequate to the demands of the public business. Heretofore proper allowances have not been made to meet such necessary and indispensable expenses. I hope this bill will do so. I am glad that the Post-Office Committee of the House and the Postmaster-General have given the subject such full and careful consideration.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, it had not been my purpose to enter into the general discussion covering this bill as a whole or its particular paragraphs. It comes from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, I believe, with their unanimous approval. It embraces appropriations of more than $60,000,000; and I am gratified to state that the estimates which were submitted by the preceding Postmaster-General have been revised by the present head of the Post-Office Department; and to my mind the results of this revision will tend to promote the efficiency of the service and the convenience of the people.

I think, therefore, that the bill in its entirety should receive the approval of this House. If the provisions of the bill were under my control, and if I should make any change in them, it would be in the direction of larger appropriation in order that the postal facilities of the people might be increased. I would not at this time adopt cheaper rates of postage, though, notwithstanding the utterance of the chairman of the committee [Mr. BLOUNT], I believe the people of the country have welcomed with heartiness and thorough indorsement every change in recent years in the direction of reduction of postage, either upon local or domestic correspondence or upon printed matter.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman did not understand me as saying that the people of the country did not approve what had been done in that respect?

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, no; but the gentleman referred to that as a cause of the existing deficiency, and that is the point I desire to discuss.

Mr. BLOUNT. But I was not complaining of the deficiency; it is smaller now than it was ten years ago.

Mr. BINGHAM. I grant that. In reference to this deficiency, if the Government of the United States would pay its own postage on the matter which to-day goes through the mails free there would not be a single cent of deficiency in the administration of the Post-Office Department. I need go into no elaboration or detail as to this statement; the facts and figures are well known. The postage of the Government on matter sent under frank or in penalty-envelopes amounts to $3,000,000 annually, perhaps more.

A MEMBER. Do you favor a change of that system?

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir; I would not change the existing system; I approve it.

This bill, wisely, to my mind, increases beyond the general percentage of increase the allowance made to post-office clerks. I trust that the present Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads will report a bill now before it for consideration, whereby this important class of postal employés, embracing upward of 5,000 subordinates, will in the future have a classification and a fixed compensation. To-day the average compensation of the post-office clerk will not exceed $500 per annum.

This bill, however, by virtue of the re-examination of the estimates which had been made by the predecessor of the present Postmaster-General, wisely allows a larger compensation to this body of subordinates; but it will not give them the classification which is so necessary and in other Departments of the Government so common.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Are we to understand that the committee found itself unable to redress these grievances in the present bill?

Mr. BINGHAM. They could not be met in the present bill, because of the rules of the House.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. And a bill is now pending in the committee to do justice in this respect?

Mr. BINGHAM. A bill with that object in view is now before the committee.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I make this inquiry because all of us have received numerous letters in that behalf.

Mr. BINGHAM. This bill, by virtue of the unanimous consent of the House—and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], could have made objection, this being, according to my recollection, the only occasion when an appropriation bill under the present rules has been allowed to come into the House incorporating new legislation—this bill takes the body of third-class postmasters, upwards of two thousand, and absolutely increases their compensation to the extent of $650,000. To that increase I have given and give here my hearty approval.

I believe in the general principle of paying subordinates of the Government well. As I have stated before, if I could add to it I would add in the way of giving larger compensation to several of the subordinate divisions of the postal service covered by the paragraphs of this bill.

This bill is also liberal in another respect. By virtue of the recent enactment in this House and in the other, and which is now pending before the President of the United States for his signature, there is a subordinate force, called technically letter-carriers, who by the adoption of the eight-hour law will have their compensation increased to the amount of a million and a half of dollars annually, or will enable the administration to so divide the work that an additional force can be employed in that service. To that proposition, covering as it does a million and a half dollars, I give my hearty indorsement, for the reason the constituency I represent individually and the great body of the people who get the benefit of the letter-carrier delivery will have a better and more efficient service.

Mr. Chairman, reference has been made to the compensation of postmasters under the law of 1883. The first, second, and third class postmasters did not, under that law, have any increased compensation except in the cases of some six or eight postmasters of the first class in cities like Baltimore, Chicago, Cincinnati, Boston, and other large cities, where they were increased $2,000—added to their compensation of $4,000. The average compensation under the law of 1883 to third-class postmasters was about the same as the old law, but the great body of the postmasters of the fourth class, by the reduction in the rate of postage from 3 cents to 2 cents, the average was made necessarily in their schedule of allowance that their compensation might be determined on. I state now, as I stated then, when that was under discussion, it in no wise reduces the compensation of postmasters of the fourth class, but in many cases increases it. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to reiterate and then reserve the balance of my time, that this bill is intelligent, that it is a good bill, that it ought to pass without change and in its entirety. I think under the Postmaster-General it will give the country the opportunity for the very best administration of the postal service. I give my hearty approval to it, with the qualification if I could make any change I would change it in giving larger compensation to the subordinate force, and by making large appropriation to increase, if possible, the efficiency of the service.

I yield now for fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LIND].

Mr. LIND. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to say anything in addition to what has been so well said by the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads; but there are so many employés in the postal service, who have an organized and active lobby—I believe I am justified to call it such—who appear before the committee and before the House, and who have been prompt to take hold of every opportunity to advance their interests, that I believe I am justified and that it is my duty to speak in favor of a class which is not organized, and which has not assailed us in the committee nor clamored for an increase of pay on the floor of the House—a class with which we are all individually familiar, especially those who represent agricultural districts, as I do—and to ask from this House that this class shall receive a reasonable and at least adequate compensation for the duties they discharge to the Government and to the people. I have reference, Mr. Chairman, to the fourth-class postmasters.

As has been stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], the clerks of first-class offices have been relieved by increased allowances for clerk-hire. Third-class postmasters have been given an ample allowance for rent, fuel, and clerk-hire. This is right, and I approve of it most heartily. Letter-carriers have also been relieved recently by a bill which has passed both Houses of Congress, and is now pending before the President for his approval, by which the eight-hour law is made applicable to them. By that bill, if it is approved by the President and becomes a law, their compensation will be almost doubled.

But the large class referred to, who render as faithful and honest service as any under the Government, numbering some fifty thousand throughout the country, who have rightful claims, but whose claims have been studiously disregarded, have as yet secured no recognition or consideration. I am familiar with their situation in my district. There are twenty counties in my district, and ten times the number of fourth-class offices that there is of the other. Politically I have no interest in them. I have no voice in their appointment or retention in office. My sole object is to secure for them, if possible, reasonable and adequate compensation for the services they render.

Take a farmer out in the country who does not clamor for the post-office, who does not want it, but who consents to act for the accommodation of his neighbors and friends, and opens his house to the public for that purpose, is he not entitled to some consideration? Mr. Chairman, he must keep his house open every day, at all hours of the day, for three hundred and sixty-five days in the year, and he frequently carries the letters and delivers them himself at the railway station without pay. In muddy weather or pleasant his doors have to be open, and the result of hours of labor at scrubbing and cleaning by the farmer's wife is frequently demolished in a few minutes. What does he get for all this trouble and annoyance? He gets the magnificent sum of, say, $12 a year.

Is any member of this House, is any member of this committee willing to say that that is adequate compensation? Any proposition to increase that by an increased percentage would not help him. You might give him the entire amount of the stamps that he legitimately sells and cancels at his office, and he would be but little, if any, better off. The only remedy is to give him a salary of, say, $5 a quarter—a small fixed amount in addition to his ordinary compensation by percentage.

I submit, gentlemen of the committee, that this is but fair and reasonable, and if you have any regard for the fourth-class postmasters, for the farmer postmasters all over this land, who perform more onerous duties for the compensation they receive than any other class of persons in the public service, you will not refuse the consent which I shall submit to embody such a proposition in this bill. I believe the suggestion, or rather the request for unanimous consent to insert such a provision in the bill, will not be and can not reasonably be objected to. I understand a gentleman from the State of Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE], also from the West, and who understands and appreciates the situation, will offer an amendment of this character, and I yield now out of my time for the purpose of permitting him to present the amendment at the desk, and have it read for the information of the House, so that all may understand it when this unanimous consent is asked for.

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend does not propose to offer an amendment at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that it would not be in order now to offer an amendment.

Mr. LIND. I desire to have it read for information. I suggest that the amendment be now read, and I shall ask unanimous consent at the proper time to offer it. I therefore request to have it read in my time if the gentleman will send it up to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MCRAE submitted the following proposed amendment, which the Clerk read:

Amend by adding a new section, in these words:

"That there shall be allowed and paid to each postmaster of the fourth class $5 for each quarter, in addition to the compensation allowed under existing law."

Mr. LIND. Now, it will be noticed by the committee that all we suggest, all that we ask in behalf of the fourth-class postmasters is an increase of $5 a quarter or $20 a year.

Mr. BLOUNT. Allow me to interrupt the gentleman to ask a question in order that there may be no misunderstanding. He does not offer that amendment at this time?

Mr. LIND. I have given notice that I shall ask unanimous consent to offer it.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is as I understood it; but it was suggested by some gentlemen around me that it was considered as a pending amendment, and in order that there might be no misapprehension I wanted to confirm my own understanding.

Mr. LIND. I made the statement that I should ask consent to offer it at the proper time. Of course I appreciate the rules of the House, and know that it would not be in order to offer it now.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that that is but a reasonable request and that it is the least that could be asked. I would also ask the attention of the committee to the fact that this involves no computation. Its effect is direct and the amount easily ascertained. We know exactly what amount of money it will take, and where it will go, and to what extent it will afford relief. The reason it should be adopted in that form is this: As long as you pay a compensation to the fourth-class postmasters upon the basis of a percentage on cancellations you can not help them by increasing that percentage, because the allowance of 100 per cent. would yield the postmaster only $5, if that is the amount of his cancellations in the quarter, and that would be the full extent of his compensation.

According to the best judgment of the members of the committee who are disposed to stand by the fourth-class postmasters, we think it ought to be made in the form suggested, by way of a specific sum. In cases, then, where a postmaster gets only $12 a year his compensation would be increased to $32 by this allowance. Does any one say that is too much? In cases where they get $20 a quarter they would get $25 a quarter by this plan. Now, as a matter of justice, as a matter of good government, and for the encouragement of these people to serve the people and the Government in the future as faithfully as they have served them in the past, I make this request in their behalf. You have helped the first-class postmasters, you have helped the second-class and third-class postmasters; why not also, I ask, help this class, who merit it more than either of the other classes?

Mr. DOCKERY. Will my friend permit me to ask him to state when this rate of compensation to fourth-class postmasters was fixed by law? There seems evidently to be some inequality in it, and I desire to fix the date of the passage of the law.

Mr. LIND. I apprehend the object of the question. It was fixed by a Republican administration; there is no question about that. But, as I said awhile ago, I do not ask this in behalf of Republicans; I do not know that there is a Republican postmaster in my district, but I ask it on behalf of the men who deserve it, and the patrons of the post-office as well. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. LIND. I will yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] four minutes, reserving one minute for myself.

Mr. McRAE. I am much obliged to the gentleman from Minnesota, but at this juncture I do not desire to submit any remarks. I will offer the amendment at the proper time. I yield back to the gentleman the time he has so generously given me.

Mr. LIND. I yield the floor.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield twenty-five minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT].

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I take this opportunity to submit some remarks on the bill (H. R. 3259) to enable the people to name their postmasters.

Mr. Chairman, this bill relates only to fourth-class postmasters, and all it undertakes to do is to provide the means whereby the people may advise the Postmaster-General in the appointment of postmasters of that class.

This is no new principle in our administration.

The Postmaster-General has always professed to be advised by the people in the selection of these officers. He receives and considers, or professes to, petitions and counter-petitions, and the advice also of Representatives in Congress who are in accord with the Administration, and of the local committees, national and State, when the Representative is not so in accord; and these Representatives and committees always profess to be controlled by the wishes of the people, though it is true that with them "the people" are only those who are of their way of thinking politically. Another thing is also true, and that is that appointments are actually made in accordance with the wishes of these Representatives and committees, with but little reference to petitions or remonstrances furnished by the people. Seldom, if ever, does the Postmaster-General disregard the wishes of these men in the appointment of these officers. And so it happens that if they have "friends to reward or enemies to punish" they are at perfect liberty to do this, even though they foist upon the people some one for postmaster distasteful to the whole community. Thus do we see that while the present system all the time recognizes the right of the people to control in this matter, their wishes may at any time be defeated by the "local boss," whom this system is admirably calculated to produce, who, while he all the time professes to be acting for the interests of the people, is really acting for his own interests and has for fourth-class postmaster whomsoever he will, and from this decision of the "local boss" there is no appeal; for, from the very nature of the present system, which fails to communicate with certainty the wishes of the people to the Postmaster-General, he must rely upon some one of supposed local knowledge for his information.

Entirely different from this star-chamber proceeding is the appointment of all other postmasters, whose nomination by the President is subject to the action of the Senate, and thus within reach of the people if the nomination has their disapproval.

Now, far more than these Presidential postmasters, with whose clerks the details are principally left, does the fourth-class postmaster come in contact with the people.

Indeed, there is no other official throughout our whole system, national, State, and municipal, brought into such close and constant business relations with the people as the fourth-class postmaster, who has to deal personally with almost every man, woman, and child within the delivery of his office, himself receiving from the hands of the people the mail sent by them and delivering into their hands the mail received by them, and himself answering patiently and civilly, or petulantly and impertinently, the thousand and one annoying questions asked by the anxious or the uninformed. He is, to an extent unknown to any other officer under our whole complex American system, the servant of the people, and all will admit that in his appointment the people ought to be consulted.

It must also be admitted that if through some practicable system they were in fact consulted, as they are now only in form, it would create with this officer a feeling of responsibility to the people, who are his real patrons and employers, a feeling of civility towards them, to which he is now too often a stranger, nestling as he does beneath the protecting wing of some member of Congress or political committee, to whom, under the present system, he feels his principal obligation. In short, no one will deny the right of the people to a voice in the selection of this officer. No one will say but that they are entitled to some legal system under which they can with certainty make their choice known to the Postmaster-General and have that choice respected. Now, this bill proposes to do precisely this; nothing more and nothing less. Should it become a law it would not take the power of appointment from the Postmaster-General nor in any way affect the accountability of the postmaster to the Post-Office Department, which should, of course, not be disturbed.

The power of removal is still left absolute in the Postmaster-General; and the power of appointment is only limited by the qualification for the postmaster prescribed by the bill, namely, that the person appointed shall have the approval of the people, none other being eligible; and it is believed that the machinery of the bill is complete for the conveyance of this approval to the Postmaster-General.

Now, to this feature of the bill which prescribes this qualification the particular attention of the committee is invited, as this is the only provision which by any possibility can be construed into an invasion of the power of appointment alleged to be vested by the Constitution in the Postmaster-General.

Now, right here is the whole of the supposed constitutional question involved in this bill, namely, that the Constitution gives the power of appointment wholly to the Postmaster-General.

To begin with, if that provision of the Constitution relating to this subject be examined it will be seen that the Constitution vests the Postmaster-General with no power whatever on this subject. Here is the whole clause:

He (the President) shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint embassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or with heads of Departments.

From the foregoing it will be seen that the only officer vested by the Constitution with power over Federal appointments is the President, and that the power is not absolute even in him, but is subject to the action of the Senate.

But the Constitution does clothe Congress with power to—

Vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they may think proper with the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments.

And under this grant of power Congress has vested the appointment of these minor postmasters in the Postmaster-General; so that his authority comes wholly from an act of Congress, and not at all, except indirectly, from the Constitution.

It must be admitted that Congress, having conferred this authority, may at any time revoke it by a repealing act. Now, if it may do this may it not do less than this by prescribing the manner in which the Postmaster-General shall exercise the power? Most certainly, unless there be something in the Constitution forbidding it; but there is nothing. By the terms of the Constitution it is left wholly to the discretion of Congress whether it will vest the Postmaster-General with this power, and is left equally to its discretion to define the way in which that power shall be exercised. Does it not follow, then, that it may prescribe qualifications and determine the eligibility of persons to be appointed? Now, this is all that this bill proposes to do. It simply provides that the appointee shall not be eligible to the appointment nor qualified to hold the office unless first recommended by a majority of the legal voters residing within the delivery of the office.

It is precisely like saying that the appointee shall himself reside within the delivery of the office, and this Congress has already said. It prescribed this qualification by the very act vesting the appointment in the Postmaster-General, in the following language:

Every postmaster shall reside within the delivery of the office to which he is appointed. (Sec. 3831, Revised Statutes.)

Thus do we see that Congress has already prescribed a qualification for the postmaster, a very proper one, too; and may they not now prescribe another, an equally proper one, namely, that he must, to be eligible, receive the approval of a majority of the legal voters residing within the delivery of the office?

It should here be kept in mind that the bill does not declare that the Postmaster-General shall appoint whoever may be thus recommended. Were it so to provide I admit it would then present a grave constitutional question, for it would then practically vest the power of appointment in the people instead of in the head of the Post-Office Department, whereas the Constitution does not authorize Congress to do the former thing, but does authorize it to do the latter.

Then keep in mind that the bill in terms recognizes the constitutional power of the Postmaster-General to decline to appoint the person so recommended, not only once and again, but as often as he chooses, and thus is his judgment and will left free to go through the whole population within the delivery of the office if he chooses; but we have seen that he can not go outside of the delivery without violating a law already on the statute-book, which no one has ever thought to claim was unconstitutional. Practically, however, the Postmaster-General would seldom, if ever, refuse to appoint the person named by the people. He would be only too glad to give them the postmaster of their choice. And I have called attention to this power still left in the Postmaster-General, not because he would be likely to have occasion to exercise it, but in order to show that the provisions of the bill are entirely within the rule laid down by Akerman, Attorney-General, in his opinion of August 31, 1871, and of Legaré, Attorney-General, therein cited, of which the present civil-service law is a notable illustration, namely, that Congress may prescribe qualifications for all those minor officers whose appointment the Constitution authorizes it to vest in the President, in the courts, or in the heads of Departments, and may limit the appointing power to such as possess the requisite qualifications.

The reason for this is obvious. The Constitution gives the Senate revisory power over all Federal appointments. It was the design of the framers of the Constitution not to confer autocratic power upon any one in the matter of appointments to office, and so the right was reserved to the Senate to set aside the will of the President and reject his choice if they should think best. Now, when the Senate, as a co-ordinate branch of Congress, consents to vest certain appointments in the heads of Departments, is it not competent for them to stipulate, as a sort of equivalent for this surrender of their revisory power over appointments, that the appointees shall possess certain qualifications, such, for instance, as that postmasters shall have the approval of the patrons of the office?

The fathers thought it wise to leave the will of the President in appointments to office under control of the Senate, and so within reach of the people. And who will say that it is unwise or unreasonable or unconstitutional for the Senate, when it clothes the Postmaster-General with power to appoint postmasters, and confers upon him all the power they had, to say that he shall appoint such as shall have the approval of the people whom they serve? This would certainly be in harmony with all the analogies and traditions of our system, in which the central thought is the conservation of popular rights. But enough! I do not believe the constitutionality of this bill will be seriously questioned. It is evident that it can in no way make less effective the postal service.

Its fairness to the people and its practicability must be admitted. We have also seen that the practical tendency of it would be to make the postmaster more attentive and obliging. But of far more consequence still is the fact that it would take out of politics, at once and forever, fifty two thousand offices, fully one-half of that immense army of men whose employment is put in jeopardy by every Presidential election.

I have no time to enter at length upon the consideration of the problem presented by the vast and ever-increasing civil service of this great and growing country. It must suffice to say that the contemplative, prudent mind views with alarm, if not with disgust, that feature of our system which makes the stake contended for in Presidential elections not so much who shall be President as who shall hold the one hundred and odd thousand offices which the successful candidate distributes among his supporters, precisely as in early, semi-barbarous times the victorious general distributed among his followers the spoils of conquest.

Very many of the very best men in the Republic consider it a great scandal that this, the most enlightened and progressive people on the face of the globe, should be found in this evening of the nineteenth century administering their civil service upon no better principle than that which governs the savage tribes in the distribution of plunder captured in war; a principle, too, which even in war all civilized nations long since outgrew.

But I must not enter upon the discussion of civil-service reform. Theoretically, all are civil-service reformers. Both of the great political parties have repeatedly declared for it in their platforms, and Presidential candidates always proclaim it in their letters of acceptance. Now, why is this? It is because there is with the whole American people a strong feeling that something ought to be done to eliminate from Presidential elections the immense civil patronage which now extends to more than one hundred thousand men, and carries with it in profits and emoluments more than $100,000,000 annually, making a total money value of patronage to the supporters of the successful candidate of more than $400,000,000. Think of it! And is it any wonder that there is a widespread feeling that the choice of Chief Executive of this great American people should not be coupled with considerations which appeal so powerfully to the selfishness and cupidity of those who make the choice, that as much as possible the choice should be kept free from all mercenary motives and made to depend upon questions of administrative policy, of foreign and domestic trade; of the public defense, of internal improvements, of tariff and taxation, and revenue and finance?

These are really the questions that should govern the people in the choice of President. But add to these the question of who shall fill one hundred thousand offices, with several times that number of aspirants for them, all active according to their expectations, and with four hundred million dollars in the pool, and tell me which will control most in the choice, these great questions of public policy or the offices? All will admit that the capture of the offices is altogether too much of an issue in, and intensifies too much, our Presidential elections, which ought to result in the calm, deliberate choice of the best man, coupled with the best political principles.

Now, this bill, if it should become a law, would strike out of the Presidential problem at a single blow fifty-two thousand of these offices, and the very ones, too, over which the scramble is most disgraceful, because appointments to them are made in the most irresponsible manner. They are also the very offices which enter most largely into the Presidential contest, scattered as they are over the whole country and carrying as they do the greedy spirit of conquest into every hamlet throughout the land.

What other machine, in fact, equals the post-office in the small country village or at the cross-roads in the manufacture of politics? Each Presidential election hatches half a dozen aspirants in each party for every such office. And after the Kilkenny contest is over he gets the office at the cross-roads who has burnt the most powder and gets the best hold upon the "local boss." And so at last there is an outcome of the Presidential election.

Now, for this periodic scandal this bill offers a perfect cure. Its appeal is to statesmanship, and not at all to partisanship. There is, in fact, no party politics in it, and it might well enough be named "A bill to take the fourth-class post-office out of politics." If any advantage will accrue by the enactment of the bill at this time it will be to the party now in possession of the offices, for it would not disturb present incumbents unless a majority of the people so demanded. Wholly disconnect these offices from Presidential elections, as this bill proposes, and the certain tendency would, as I believe, be to disregard politics in the choice of persons to fill them. But if it should work otherwise in some communities, as it might, it would allow the people to have a postmaster of like politics with themselves, and so illustrate the doctrine of home rule and popular rights instead of forcing upon such people, as the present system does, an officer of political sentiments offensive to them.

I said a moment ago that theoretically we are all civil-service reformers, as indeed we are, not excepting the President. But practically it is difficult to resist the importunities of place-hunters, and equally difficult to withstand the temptation to use the officers to advance personal ends.

Now the chief excellence of this bill is that it treats of civil-service reform fundamentally. It removes altogether the temptation to use the officers in politics by placing them absolutely beyond the reach of President or Representative or "local boss," and thus as to 52,000 of them makes certain the reform demanded by all.

I repeat, this bill is non-partisan; and if a law it would make one-half the offices non-partisan also. But should it fail of this, it would be just as fair to one party as the other; with no advantage to either, except to the Democrats, as already shown, which, as a Republican, I am willing to concede for the sake of the law.

Mr. Chairman, we are on the eve of an important Presidential election. The two great parties are already maneuvering for position, and on every side may be seen premonitory symptoms of the coming struggle. Now, let us as representatives of the people, without regard to party, testify to the sincerity of our civil-service-reform professions, so frequently made, by passing this bill in the interest of the people, who demand it, and who know how to appreciate it.

If, however, notwithstanding the many reasons, all of a high character and in the interest of good government, which urge this reform, it should be determined by the majority to still keep in the Presidential pool these 52,000 offices and gamble, as heretofore, for the whole stake, all the minority can do is to play the game and play it to win. But one thing is certain: when the campaign is over and the result ascertained, one or the other of the two great parties will be sorry that this bill did not become a law. One or the other will have a crying spell. Now is the time for both parties to avoid this contingency by uniting in its passage, and thus be fair each toward the other, fair towards the people, and fair towards this great reform. [Applause.]

NATIONAL GRANGE, PATRONS OF HUSBANDRY, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., February 10, 1888.

SIR: Observing that you have introduced in Congress a bill making fourth-class postmasters elective, I have the honor to submit the following extract from proceedings of the twenty-first session of the National Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, held at Lansing, Mich., November 16 to 24, 1887.

From the committee on resolutions:

"Your committee has examined a resolution asking the National Grange to favor a change in the law so that postmasters may be elected by the people directly interested, and we recommend its adoption."

On motion the report was concurred in.

Respectfully,

[SEAL.] JOHN TRIMBLE,
Secretary National Grange.

Hon. WM. W. GROUT, M. C.

A bill (H. R. 3259) to enable the people to name their postmasters.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no person whose appointment as postmaster to any post-office of the United States is now or hereafter may be vested by Congress in the head of the Post-Office Department shall be eligible to such appointment or qualified to hold such office unless first recommended by a majority of the legal voters for electors of President and Vice-President who are patrons of such office and reside within its delivery, by a vote in open meeting warned for that purpose; and any person who receives mail matter at more than one post-office shall be allowed to vote for postmaster for that office only nearest to which by the usual traveled way he has his legal residence.

SEC. 2. That within sixty days after this act shall become a law the Postmaster-General shall send every postmaster of the class named in the first section a copy thereof, who shall post the same in some conspicuous place in said post-office. Said postmaster shall also, within sixty days thereafter, forward to the Postmaster-General a complete list of the patrons of said office who are legal voters and reside within its delivery, and shall also enter in a book, always to be kept in said post-office and open to public inspection, such list; and it shall be the duty of the person holding such post-office to correct quarterly upon said book such list, and transmit a statement of such corrections with the quarterly returns required of such postmaster by the Post-Office Department. If any postmaster, after receiving a copy of this law from the Postmaster-General, shall refuse or neglect for more than sixty days to forward the list of resident patrons herein required, or shall fail to transmit with his quarterly returns the required corrections of said list, it shall disqualify him for longer holding such post-office.
